For myself I wish that the practice might cease, and then, I think, there would be no discussion as to whether appropriation bills should be distributed here to different committees. If the Appropriations Committee and the Senate confined its duties to what I think were intended under the Constitution, to the examination of the bills sent here from the House and the correction of errors or the insertion of items which had been inadvertently omitted in the making up of the appropriation bills in the House, we should have no criticism of the Appropriations Committee, and we should have no desire on the part of other committees to get the appropriation bills, I think. But it is the practice which has sprung up here in the Senate to treat an appropriation bill as an original matter after it gets here that originates criticism, and I think accounts largely for the desire of other committees to have appropriation bills referred to them.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question right there. I propose myself to oppose certain items contained in the pending bill, but I do not think I go so far as the Senator from Connecticut goes when he advocates the almost entire elimination of the Senate from the work of constructing these bills. Therefore I ask the Senator in reference to the proposed amendment of the committee on page 23, "For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, reported to Congress at its present session in Senate Document No. 70, $441,104.80." That is nearly a third of the Senate committee's addition. Certainly the Senator from Connecticut would not say that it was not a legitimate function of the Senate, if the House had omitted to make an appropriation to pay these final judgments of the Court of Claims, to add that item to the bill. What would the Senator say, following the line of argument defining his opinion as to the proper treatment by the Senate of these bills, as to that item, for illustration?

Mr. PLATT. I would say this about it. I do not know whether that report was made from the Court of Claims before the bill was sent to the Senate from the House, but if the certification of the judgments by the Court of Claims had been made to Congress before the urgent deficiency bill came from the House to the Senate, I would simply decline to consider it and let the House send us another urgent deficiency bill. I do not know whether it is true or not that that certification came to Congress before this bill came over from the House. I do not suppose that it did; but if it did it would illustrate just what I would have the Senate do in a case of that kind.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator that Document No. 70 is a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury dated January 13, 1896, containing a list of judgments. They are nearly all final judgments for the extra pay of letter carriers. At the close of the document——

Mr. PLATT. Where is it?

Mr. CHANDLER. The item is on page 23 of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Where is it in the report?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have the report in my hand, and I will hand it to the Senator. On the last page there are a few miscellaneous judgments. Manifestly the Senator from Connecticut, who wishes to be discriminating and just on this subject, and not to undertake to bring the Senate within too narrow limits, would be in favor, I think, of having those judgments added to this bill whether the certification was in time for the bill in the House or whether it came afterwards.

Mr. PLATT. I am not speaking of items; I am speaking of the well-known practice which prevails in the House not to make appropriations as large as they are required to be made and sending the bills to the Senate for the purpose of having them increased in the Senate, knowing, as they suppose, that the items must be appropriated for, and then holding up their hands and talking about their economy and the extravagance of the Senate. I do not know how far the items added to the pending appropriation bill may justify the argument in this particular case, but that that matter has been going on here for years and years there can be no question.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut has called attention to a condition that the Committee on Appropriations is continually meeting, and a condition that has given rise to a feeling of restiveness in the committee, sometimes of indignation and protest, at the practice which the House has of making inadequate appropriations and leaving it for the Senate, through its committee, at first to report the appropriations which are incomplete as they come from the House. The committee has felt restive under this practice. We have tried at different times, in some degree, to adopt a policy that would leave the bills as the House has left them. But the Senate itself and the Senator himself will see that the moment we do that we are beset both by Senators who discover the omissions of the House and by the Departments, who keenly feel the result of the omissions in the transaction of their business, to set right what the House has failed to do, and we are told that the discretion is as large in the Senate as in the House, and that the duty of the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate is not simply to deal with the question as to whether the House has done its duty, but with what appropriations are needed for the running of the Government, and that we should take the broad view.

We are continually beset by these appeals, I say, from Senators and heads of Departments; and I think the Senator will see that, impatient as we are at the course of the House, the undoubted broad, general view that it is our business to do the right thing, whatever our neighbor does, is the view that ought to obtain. The Senator, I think, with the Senator from New Hampshire, goes too far; and I do not think, because the right of originating appropriation bills is in the House, that we should——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not exclusively in the House.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that we should be narrowed simply to correcting errors and forms and leave the bills with them. We could no more do that than the Committee on Finance could——

Mr. COCKRELL. Why does the Senator say that the right to originate appropriation bills is in the House?

Mr. PLATT. I do not say that. I admit the constitutional right of the Senate, but the practice ever since the foundation of the Government has been that the House would originate the bills.

Mr. HALE. It is a practically conceded right, and I do not presume it will be ever raised again. I have my views upon the subject. I think the right exists there; but that question is not up now.

As I was proceeding to say, you can no more hold the Committee on Appropriations and the Senate to a rigid rule of only correcting errors and forms than you can hold the Senate and its Committee on Finance upon the undoubted question that the House is the sole body to raise revenue by a bill. The whole right of amendment is resting in this body and always has and always will be freely performed. The Senator from Connecticut himself, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, when the next tariff bill is reported to this body, with the undoubted right on the part of the House, which nobody questions, to originate that tariff bill, will not be content to resolve himself into one of a committee to correct forms and errors, but will in many respects revolutionize that bill. Why? Because he will believe that it is for the good of some section, it may be, or of the whole country to depart radically from the bill as passed by the other House. So the Committee on Appropriations finds itself in just that situation.

I agree with the Senator that in many cases the House fails to appropriate. I think it does it with its eyes open, and that there follows an arraignment of the Senate as an extravagant body for adding to its appropriations. Yet I do not see any remedy. I think we have got to bear that unjust reproach just as in human life many men find themselves constantly misinterpreted. They are trying to do the right thing, but their motives are misinterpreted and they are found fault with. The only thing, as the committee is trying to do and will continue to try to do as long as it is trusted by the Senate, is to get the appropriations as nearly right as possible, no matter what the House has done.

Now, in the line of this endeavor, the report which I have submitted with the bill shows pretty much all the additions which have been made. They are additions that were not made unless by the estimate of the Department, the certification of the court, or items coming down from the proper accounting bodies of the Treasury Department. Almost all of the items are included in three or four large clauses in the bill. The appropriations for back pay and bounty, claims certified by the Department, is an appropriation that we make in gross. These meritorious claims are pushing and they claim it as urgent. An appropriation is made for expenses of United States courts, brought in by the Department, duly certified to, owed to their officials and minor officers and pressing for payment; and we have got to pay them. The item for judgments of the United States courts, running on interest which we are paying, the courts certify to us through the Department.

The time of appeal has passed; it is a debt against the Government, pushing and pressing. We have always put an appropriation to pay those judgments on the urgent deficiency bill. The House did not do it. I think in this case the certification came later than the passage of the bill by the House. But whether it did or not, if the committee had neglected it the result would simply be that we would have put it on some other bill. Therefore the committee, dealing with it in rather the large general way, overcame their own restiveness and impatience, which certainly is as great as that of the Senator from Connecticut, and put on that item.

Then the item for the Library building was put on, that noble structure which meets our eyes whenever we gaze to the east, in which we shall have great pride as Americans, which shall take our constantly increasing library in all its expansive rooms and corridors, and will in generatious to come present an accumulation of books, documents, and valuable treatises that will be the pride of the English-speaking nations all over the globe. The superintendent, a man whom nobody distrusts, has said to us that he is right now where he needs this money to perfect that work during the early spring months. We have got to appropriate it either now or at some other time. General Casey knows that of which he speaks. He is the one man who will be able at the end of the structure of a great Government building, after expending millions of dollars upon the building, to keep the figure inside of the original estimate and turn over money unexpended to the Treasury. He tells us, and the committee specially appointed to consider that subject, the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, presided over by the veteran and distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], after investigating the whole subject, tells us that it is essential for us to put that item on the bill. We did not think that because the House committee failed to do it or because even the House would arraign us with extravagance because we had put it on, that that ought to be the only controlling element in our consideration of the subject, and so we put it on.

These three or four large items make up about $1,300,000 of the $1,500,000 of increase. Now, I am glad that the Senator has interposed at this point and made this objection, because it shows the difficulties that the committee encounters. One Senator complains that we put on too much, that we ought to hold the House down to their appropriations, and many other Senators will complain because we have not added to the bill much more than we have thought it advisable and desirous; because this is not a general deficiency appropriation bill. It is a general appropriation bill, but it is not the regular deficiency appropriation bill, which is what may be called the "cleaning-up" bill and comes nearly at the end of a session. The urgent deficiency bill is a bill that, as the Senator knows, has grown up in the custom and practice of the two Houses within the last half dozen years and takes up the items that are most pushing. Therefore it is that in regard to many items we have been urged to put upon this bill we have explained to Senators and to the Departments that they will go on the other bill; and in a reasonable manner they assent to that course, and so they expect that will be done. Now, I have given as well as I can——

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I know the Senator sees and realizes and feels restive under it, but does he not see that when it comes about that a bill for $4,000,000 is made five and one-half million dollars by the committee here in the Senate by putting on these items he opens the door and invites Senators to present to the committee items which they think ought to go on the bill, and then because the committee does not put on the items which Senators present to them and urge upon them it is criticised on that account?

Mr. HALE. No, I do not think that in any way it comes because we open the door. We have that condition constantly. We have to do the best we can. We had in these cases to discriminate as well as we could between the urgent deficiencies and those that would naturally go over to the regular general deficiency bill. I do not think the fact that we put on certain items has anything to do with the action of Senators. In fact, they do not know whether we are going to put them on or not.

Mr. PLATT. They understand it.

Mr. HALE. They seek to have their own items put on. They do undoubtedly understand that the committee will always put on more or less items. I wish sometimes that I could exchange service with Senators who I know in a good-natured way and not an unfriendly way to the committee make these strictures, and let them serve on the Committee on Appropriations for a time. Then they would see how difficult it would be to carry out a programme like that suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, not to add to the appropriation bills as passed by the other House. It would be practically giving up the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations representing this great body, and would leave the whole framework and passage of the great appropriation bills to the other House without their being subjected to the coordinate action of this body. I doubt if the Senate itself, or the Senator himself, on reflection, would go as far as that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question bearing on the precise point that he is discussing. Here is an appropriation for completing the Congressional Library building, which I am very much in favor of. I think the appropriation ought to be made, and that it ought to be made now, upon the pending bill. But it is equally true to say that it ought to have been put on in the other House. Now, was the request made that it should be put on in the other House, and——

Mr. HALE. The Senator——

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not fully asked my question. And is it not true that a great many officers of the Government and a great many individuals who want appropriations stay away from the House of Representatives, do not present there their claims or the subjects in which they are interested, intending to let the bills go through the House without having the items put upon them, and then come over here and follow up the Senate committee, and the Senate committee have the items put on in the Senate, because it is easier to get it done here, they think?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the chairman of the committee, knows a great deal more about these matters than I do. He is also a member of the Special Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress; and he will answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state——

Mr. PLATT. Allow me to supplement what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, and then the Senator from Iowa can answer the whole inquiry.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. PLATT. Take the matter of claims arising out of Indian affairs. I presume that during the present session of Congress I have had as many as five or six persons representing matters pending before the Indian Affairs Committee say to me, "We suppose the best way to have the claim paid is by an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill in the Senate." They seem to have come to understand that the way to get their claims through is to have them put on the Indian appropriation bill by amendment in the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer first the supplemental question of the Senator from Connecticut. It has become a sort of custom to make the Indian appropriation bill an ominum-gatherum for all the claims that people have for Indian depredations or otherwise. The items are usually referred first in this body to the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which the Senator is a most distinguished member, and that committee straightway reports them back to the Senate for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, and thus they become in order.

Mr. HALE. That committee reports favorably.

Mr. ALLISON. It reports favorably. Then they are put upon the appropriation bills, especially upon the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. President, the urgent deficiency bill is a new form of deficiency appropriation. Under the old practice it was the custom to bring in a general deficiency bill toward the end of a session, the bill covering all the deficiencies for the various Departments of the Government during the year, but, under the present practice, reprehensible or otherwise, of late years the appropriations for the fiscal year are so inadequate as respects carrying on the ordinary operations of the Government that it becomes necessary to have what is called an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I have no doubt at this moment (although I have not made inquiry especially in regard to these particular claims coming from the Department of Justice, but it has happened in past years, and is the case in the current year, I believe) that the courts of the United States in actual session are obliged to adjourn and postpone contesting cases, criminal and otherwise, pending before them, because there is no money to carry on the operations of the courts. Hence it becomes necessary that, in an urgent deficiency appropriation bill, these appropriations shall be made in order that the ordinary operations of the Government shall go on.

Now, recurring to the Library amendment, as was suggested, I happen to be a member of the committee of which the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] now in my eye is chairman. Soon after the pending bill came to the Senate I was notified to appear as a member of that committee at its session, in order to consider the question of an appropriation for the Library building. That committee met. General Casey, the superintendent of the building, Captain Green, the acting superintendent, and other gentlemen were present before it, and General Casey said to us that if he had this appropriation now it would make a difference of six months at least in the time of the completion of the new Library building; that it would take six months longer to complete the building if he had to await the appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill, so called.

This is only in part a deficiency, when you come to analyze it carefully. It is a necessary appropriation in order that the Library building, which has cost us nearly $6,000,000, shall be completed and the keys turned over to the two Houses of Congress by the middle of January next. He made a strong case before the committee. Having in view such inquiries as have been made here to-day by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Connecticut, I said to him: "General Casey, why did you not present your case before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, in order that the Senate might not be subjected to the criticism of swelling these bills?" as the Senator from Connecticut now criticises us for doing. He said that he went before the committee as soon as he could get there, and that when he reached the committee he was told by the committee that it was too late; that it had considered the bill, that it had been passed upon in the House committee, and that he must go to the Senate committee and get the item put on in the Senate. They recognized the necessity for the appropriation and made no objection to it.

The Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress reported the amendment and sent it to the Committee on Appropriations. The subject was not only considered, therefore, by the Committee on Appropriations, but it was considered also by the Committee on the Library; and there was a unanimous judgment that as to an expenditure of this sort, of so great importance to the convenience of the two Houses and appertaining to a great building which had already cost five and a half million dollars, it would be unwise to postpone until June or July, perhaps, the necessary appropriation for the completion of the building, so it was put on the bill. Although the Senator from Connecticut criticises the Committee on Appropriations for reporting the amendment, I have no doubt that if we should have a yea-and-nay vote he would be the last man to cast his vote in the negative as respects so important an appropriation.

That reaches $480,000 of the increase that we have put on the bill. The principal other item of increase is $441,000 for judgments of the Court of Claims not appealed from. Those judgments draw 4 per cent interest, and were certified to the Senate—said to have been certified, and I have no doubt they were certified—after the appropriation bill had passed the other House.

Mr. PLATT. No, before; a week before.

Mr. ALLISON. Let me say that dates are not so important when you remember that those documents are sent to the table of the President of the Senate or the table of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and are referred to committees and immediately go to the Public Printer. They are not read in detail in the two Houses. They are simply presented, ordered to be printed, and referred to the proper committee. It is often a week or ten days after the date of the reference before any eye in any one of the committees can have an opportunity of seeing those documents. Therefore I think I can say without fear of successful contradiction that this item also was not before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Now, here are two items, one of $480,000 and one of $440,000, the last one having interest charged against the Government at the rate of 4 per cent; and whatever we may say of the credit of the Government, it certainly is not wise for us to be paying the current rate of interest, 4 per cent, if in any way we can pay those claims. There are other items, but I do not intend to discuss them in detail. The principal other item is the one which the Senator from New Hampshire says it is his purpose to criticise, and of course that is proper. But the items as to the Department of Justice are important ones; and, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who expresses his purpose to criticise those items, that if we shall remain in session for two months longer, in addition to the deficiencies here presented to us, he will find other deficiencies for the current year to carry on the courts of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me a word at this point?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] spoke of the amounts proposed to be appropriated for the courts as expenditures already made and constituting an indebtedness already existing. I do not understand that to be an accurate statement, if the Senator from Maine will allow me. I do not understand that the amounts now proposed to be appropriated for deficiencies of the courts have already been expended. The officials intrusted with those expenditures have in a half or three-quarters of a year used up the appropriations for the whole year.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire is wrong.

Mr. CHANDLER. And now they come in and say, "Not that we owe so much money which you must pay, but we want to incur such and such additional indebtedness in order to carry on the courts. You must pay it or the courts must stop." Am I not right?

Mr. HALE. No; the Senator from New Hampshire is wrong about it. A great portion of the money we are now proposing to appropriate has already been expended. The Department has not the money, and the bills will come in for the next three or four months and will swamp a large proportion of these appropriations. As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has indicated, before we get through the year there will be hundreds and hundreds of thousands more wanted upon other bills that will come in.

The Department is always behind. It comes from a very bad system of appropriations that the other House makes in this manner. They only appropriate about enough to carry the Department around to the 1st of January, and for nearly two months now the Department has not had money. So a great portion of the appropriation now proposed to be made comes for the past as well as the future.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me while we are on this subject?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The expenditures for United States courts have grown in ten years from about $3,000,000 to $6,000,000. For the current year $3,000,000 has already been appropriated and expended——

Mr. HALE. Up to December.

Mr. CHANDLER. And $3,000,000 more is proposed to be appropriated and expended, making $6,000,000. If the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Maine are right (and we will discuss that question more at length when those items are reached), before the end of the present Congress we will have to appropriate a million or two million dollars more, and that will make the expenditures for the courts during the present fiscal year $8,000,000 instead of $6,000,000, which is the highest amount they have ever yet attained. If the Senators are right that will be the result.

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt that if it were possible to clean up the Department of Justice to the 1st day of July, so as to start without any arrearages, in addition to what we appropriated last year, added to by what is proposed to be appropriated in the pending bill, a million or two million dollars more would be needed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not intend to argue the question as to the courts at this moment, but I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire and to other Senators that it is impossible to arrange in advance or in time for the total expenditures of the United States courts. Here is the pay of witnesses, of jurors, of marshals and their deputies, with mileage, etc. Every one of those is an independent item, not under the control of the Department of Justice, not under the control of the two Houses of Congress, not even under the control of the courts. A new case arises in the circuit court of the State of Iowa, if you please, or of the State of Ohio, and a large number of witnesses are summoned, and the marshal has fees and mileage to and from distant points for the purpose of summoning those jurors and witnesses.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the Attorney-General make an estimate to cover probable increases?

Mr. ALLISON. He does make an estimate, and I am merely trying to show that it is always a flexible estimate and can never be accurately made. It has been made from year to year, but never has been found enough.

Now, if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] or the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and his committee will so alter and arrange those laws that the marshals and the deputy marshals and the attorneys and assistant attorneys shall have specific compensation and none other, and that they shall not be allowed of their own volition to create fees by artificial causes or by real causes, and thus swell the expenditures of the courts from year to year, it will be different. Take certain States of the Union. Take, if you please, the State of North Carolina or the State of Texas——

Mr. PLATT. Or the Indian Territory.

Mr. ALLISON. Or the Indian Territory or my own State, Iowa, which I will include in order that there may be no discrimination as to States. You will find that the prosecutions in the States and Territories are enormous and are increasing as to illicit distilleries, the sale of intoxicating liquors, and so on. No court can absolutely regulate those charges and fees; no Attorney-General can estimate accurately what they will be, and therefore these estimates are from the necessity of the situation often wide of the mark. But whatever they are they must be paid when they have been incurred and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Government.

With the exception of two or three items, every item that has been put into the bill has been put there because it was regarded as urgent in its character, which ought to be appropriated for now. It is a misfortune that those appropriations were not provided in the other House, but they were not, and the Senate, having knowledge of the fact and of the needs of the Government, certainly can not abdicate its powers, because I do not agree with the Senator from Connecticut that we are a mere supervisory power, that we are to stand by and sit by and do nothing except to see that appropriations which are proposed to be made by the other House are wise appropriations.

If I understand the meaning of the Constitution of my country, it is with respect to appropriations in this body as it is with regard to every other public question. There is no limitation on this body as to the power of amendment, not even to revenue bills, as was so well stated by the Senator from Maine. It is true as to revenue bills that the House of Representatives must originate them, but when they come here we can, if we choose, and we have done it many times, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what we please as amendments to those bills.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] claimed that we could even originate appropriation bills in this body; and that has been for a long time a disputed question between the two Houses. But that we are to be limited as to the power of amendment seems to me to be a dangerous doctrine to be asserted in the Senate by so eminent a lawyer as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

ASSISTANT DOORKEEPERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a privileged resolution, which I have no doubt will be assented to by the members of the Senate. An amendment will be offered by a Senator on the other side.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Alonzo H. Stewart, of Iowa, be, and he is hereby, chosen assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution:

And that Bernard W. Layton be, and he is hereby, chosen acting assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I will state the reason why I offer the amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio. The custom in the Senate, indeed in both Houses of Congress, has been that no matter which party controls the organization, on each side of the Chamber there shall be one officer satisfactory to the side. It is true that heretofore, since 1879, those offices have been filled by appointment and not by election, but I think myself that the better rule is to have both officers selected by a resolution.

The resolution and the amendment create no additional offices whatever. The resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio is simply to fill the vacancy created by the death of Mr. Isaac Bassett. The other officer, Mr. Layton, is here by appointment. It is proposed simply to designate both by a resolution, without any increase in the number of officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. HARRIS. Let the original proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Alonzo H. Stewart, of Iowa, be, and he is hereby, chosen assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Now let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution:

And that Bernard W. Layton be, and he is hereby, chosen acting assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest that the Senator put in the amendment the State from which Mr. Layton comes.

Mr. GORMAN. Very well; I will insert the words "of Ohio" after his name.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the selection of these two officers of the Senate, but I have a profound objection to appointments being made or elections being had without any kind of knowledge, consultation, or consent on the part of Senators. The system of appointments being made by a few without the knowledge or the consent of or communication with Senators is, in my opinion, an exceedingly objectionable one; and for that reason, while I shall very cheerfully vote for the selection of these persons, and have no doubt of their competency for the positions, I shall ask that the resolution go over, in order that we may have further knowledge upon the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senator from Florida will not insist upon his request. The appointment of Mr. Stewart is to fill a vacancy, and there is no dissent in the Chamber——

Mr. CALL. I have not the slightest objection——

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to say a word, and hear what I have to say? It is to fill a vacancy, and there is no dissent in the Chamber on that proposition.

Now, as to the other office; the amendment does nothing but confirm the gentleman in the place which he now fills. It gives him exactly the place he now has, with his present salary, and I do not see how the Senator can object to it.

Mr. CALL. I have said that I do not object on the ground of the competency of these two persons. I have sat here for many years, and I have seen additions to the committees; I have seen the service of the Senate filled, and never yet in seventeen years have I been consulted in regard to the appointment of a single page, nor has the State which I in part have represented for so many years ever had a single one upon this floor. Before I came here there was, I think, by the courtesy of the Republicans, a little boy from Florida here. But never have I had any knowledge whatever of the manner in which the business of this body is conducted.

Now, in deference to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], I withdraw the objection; but I do protest, and I shall hereafter protest, against the secret methods by which the business of the Senate is conducted, for so far as I am concerned they are secret.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know whether there is a division of honors between the two parties; whether one of the gentlemen is a Republican and the other a Democrat.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that I do not know the politics of either of the two gentlemen. I never inquired. I consider it the most nonpartisan measure that ever came before this body.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know whether or not what I have asked is the fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is due to the Senate to say that after consultation with our present very efficient Sergeant-at-Arms, who usually has appointed these officers, by common consent it was agreed that one should be chosen on this side of the Chamber and one on the other, and from among the young fellows who have really grown up from pages, passing through the experience Mr. Bassett passed through during his long period of service. I do not know the politics of either of the gentlemen. I know them by their faces when I see them. I know they are active, energetic, efficient, and will no doubt be better officers in the places proposed to be assigned to them than any new persons could possibly be.

I suppose the selection of the gentleman who sits on the other side of the Chamber was made by our Democratic friends. Mr. Stewart was named on this side by general agreement, I may say. As for his politics, I do not know that he has any. If there is any misunderstanding about it I would rather let the resolution go over until to-morrow, although I supposed a matter of this kind could be disposed of at this time.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to say a word?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The young man named in the resolution who has been here nineteen years is a Republican. The other young gentleman who is named in the amendment is a Democrat who was put in here by the other side of the Chamber. They are both very satisfactory to this side of the Chamber, I think, and I hope there will be no delay in the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is no objection on this side.

Mr. SQUIRE. I wish to say a word in addition to what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has stated. With the permission of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I will state that I understand that Mr. Stewart is really the only person now connected with the personnel of the Sergeant-at-Arms' office who is familiar with all the proceedings and methods of the Senate, he having been here all of these years. He is the only person who is familiar with the methods in vogue in the Senate on public occasions. He is thereby peculiarly fitted for the position and the best fitted of any person at present connected with the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, I will state that I have known Mr. Stewart very well for the nineteen years I have been here. He is a very efficient young officer, but for any Senator to say that he is the only person who comprehends the duties is saying a great deal too much.

Mr. SQUIRE. I mean the only one connected with the Sergeant-at-Arms' office.

Mr. HARRIS. There is not a Senator here who does not know both of these young men. We have had ample opportunity to know them and to know that they are extremely efficient and very worthy.

Mr. GEORGE. I would not have occupied any time if I had been allowed to proceed. I merely desire to say that if Mr. Stewart is the choice of the Republican side of the Chamber it is very satisfactory to me. If the other gentleman is put forward as the choice of this side of the Chamber, I wish to say that I have never had an opportunity of expressing any choice on the subject. That is all.

Mr. GORMAN. After the statement of my friend, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I think it is necessary for me to make a statement.

Under the resolution of 1879 the two positions which are now about to be filled by a resolution of the Senate were made subject to appointment by the Sergeant-at-Arms. That is the rule of the body to-day. Under that rule Mr. Layton was selected as acting assistant doorkeeper on this side of the Chamber when we organized two years ago, at which time every Democratic Senator in this body had as perfect and as full knowledge as I had of what was being done and acted upon all appointments made.

Now, our friends on the other side of the Chamber, after a conference among themselves, desire to fill the vacancy created by Captain Bassett's death by a resolution of the Senate rather than by appointment by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. GEORGE. They had a consultation. Why not let us have one?

Mr. GORMAN. And in order to put the two officers on an exact equality I have moved to insert the name of Mr. Layton as the acting assistant doorkeeper. He is now in office and is performing the duties. That is all there is of it.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make only one remark in response to the Senator from Maryland. If the other side have taken the pains to select their candidate in caucus, as I understood they did, I do not see any reason why the Democrats should not have the same privilege. I am opposed to these little things that come around outside of the Chamber being disposed of without giving us a fair show. I have nothing against the gentleman, so far as I know, but I should like to go through the form, at least, of voting on the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether the Senator's complaint is that this gentleman was selected according to the Mississippi plan?

Mr. GEORGE. The remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts is a very unusual one. It is a little fling which he has no right to make, and therefore I shall not make any response to it. But as a member of the Senate and as a member of the minority of this body, I say that whenever we go into the election of an officer the members of the minority generally have a right to be heard on the subject. I should like to go through the form of it anyhow, just to keep up appearances.

Mr. HOAR. The Mississippi plan, I understand, is a plan by which candidates are selected by the intelligence of the State and not by the numbers at large. That is all I meant to say.

Mr. GEORGE. The reply to that is that the constitutions of Massachusetts and of Mississippi are very much alike upon that subject, and everybody can vote in Mississippi who is entitled to vote under the law and the constitution of the State as much so as in the State of Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GEORGE. I object to the consideration of the resolution for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the appropriation bill.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLATT. This little episode having ended for to-day——

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator will pardon me, I am not anxious about this matter, but it seems to me that this is a question of privilege entitled to consideration and action at once—a question touching the organization of the Senate, and I do not understand that it has to go over a day under objection. I do not pose as a parliamentarian, but I should like to call the attention of those who are better versed than I am to that point.

Mr. PLATT. We were discussing the question of an appropriation bill when the question of privilege was interposed and resulted in it being discovered that there was some want of harmony on the other side of the Chamber. I desire now to come back to the matter of the appropriation bill, and I want to disclaim any purpose to criticise the Committee on Appropriations. I have been, I think, a hard and fast friend of the Committee on Appropriations in a good many battles that they have had to fight here in the Senate, and I do not wish to be understood as criticising them, nor do I wish to be understood as saying that they should abdicate any proper and legitimate function of the committee; and I hold, pretty radically, that we can originate appropriation bills here if we choose. We do originate appropriation bills every day; we pass bills originally here which carry appropriations, and very often large appropriations. So we are not disagreed upon that point; but nevertheless the trouble remains, and the committee admit it, and it is just as serious to them as it is to the other members of the Senate, that we are drifting along and drifting along until it comes to be understood not only by the House of Representatives, but by the Departments and by Senators, that the spot to get legislation upon appropriation bills is here in the Senate.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says, in reply to a suggestion of mine, that that had come to be an understanding with regard to one bill which I know about, the Indian appropriation bill. He says that the Committee on Indian Affairs recommend the amendments, so as to have them in order. That is true, Mr. President. I do not suppose that the Senator from Iowa intended to criticise me as a member of that committee, because the Senator knows that very frequently I have been in the minority, and he will remember one very large item of $3,000,000 which I opposed, and which he opposed as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, which was recommended by a majority vote of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

But under the custom which has grown up the recommendations of the committees of the Senate for amendments to be attached to appropriation bills so as to make them in order has come to be very much a matter of form, or a matter of courtesy, or a matter of favor to Senators who desire to have the amendments put in shape to be placed on appropriation bills; and the fact that so many committees do, as a matter of favor or of form, or, perhaps, upon a contest in a committee, by a majority vote recommend amendments to be placed on appropriation bills in the Senate, arises from the fact that it has come to be understood here that the appropriation bills are to be largely amended in the Senate. Nothing that has been said by the Committee on Appropriations meets this suggestion. It is a growing evil; and the more appropriation bills are amended here in the Senate the more it will be understood in the other House, in the Departments, and by Senators who desire to favor amendments, that here is the place for amendments to such bills. I would not have the committee abdicate their functions at all; I would not for a moment concede that we can not originate appropriation bills here in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean general appropriation bills?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I mean we can constitutionally originate general appropriation bills or any appropriation bills. I know the practice has been against it, but I have no doubt of our constitutional right to do it if we choose. I do not believe an appropriation bill is a revenue bill.

I doubt, Mr. President, whether General Casey would have waited to come here to the Senate for an amendment appropriating $480,000 to complete the Library building—which, I agree, is a very proper amendment, and which I shall vote for if it comes before the Senate—if it had not been for the understanding which has gone abroad that here is the spot to get amendments to appropriation bills and to have the necessary appropriations made.

I do not know how the committee are going to meet the difficulty, and I do not know how the Senate are going to meet it; but I do think that some action is necessary on the part of the Senate to let the House of Representatives understand, and let the Departments understand, that they must not wait and come to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to get the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not like to detain the Senate from the practical business of dealing with the pending bill; but I should at some time like to say a few words on the question which has been adverted to by the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Iowa, and perhaps I may be permitted to say what I desire now as well as at any other time.

The Constitution provides that the House of Representatives shall originate bills for raising revenue. That was put into the Constitution when the compromise known as the Connecticut compromise was made, by which the States were to vote as equals in the Senate and be represented according to numbers in the House of Representatives. And it is an interesting fact that it is the only constitutional provision in regard to which General Washington, who was president of the Constitutional Convention, expressed an opinion. He is on record as saying that he thought that it was very important indeed that the convention should adopt that provision, he understanding, undoubtedly, that the compromise could not get through without it.

The House of Representatives has claimed that that clause in the Constitution prohibited the Senate from originating general appropriation bills on the ground that it was well settled in England that a provision raising revenue was always germane as an amendment to one for expending revenue, because the question whether you should appropriate a certain amount of money depended on the question whether or not you could get it by taxation. The House of Representatives insisting upon that and the Senate taking the other view, we have always been compelled to yield. Mr. Webster at a very early day declared that, while his opinion was otherwise, of course it was a matter which must be settled by the House of Representatives. That is apparent from the obvious consideration that the House will always on constitutional grounds simply lay on the table or refuse to deal with a general appropriation bill which we originate and send over to them. We can not do the same thing with their bills, because we admit they have the right to originate appropriation bills, and therefore we can not refuse to pass such a bill on the ground that the House originated it, or on the ground that the House would be unreasonable toward some other bill.

So the thing, whatever may be the reason for it, is practically settled that the body which is represented according to numbers is entitled to originate general appropriations; and it is a very interesting consideration in regard to the income-tax debate. I came across the other day the copy of a paper in the handwriting of a near relative of my own who was a member of the convention that framed the Constitution and a member of the First Congress in General Washington's Administration. He had charge of the measure for the assumption of the State debts, and summed up the debate on that question. He said that one of the arguments which had been brought against the measure for the assumption of the State debts was that there was no principle on which the proper quota of the expenditures by the different States in the Revolutionary war could be ascertained. He replied that, in his opinion, the quota for the past was that which had been established by the Constitution itself for the future; that is, that the expenses of this Government were to be paid by the States in proportion to population. This clearly shows that he took it for granted, and that he was addressing auditors who took it for granted, that with the exception of those expenses which were paid for out of the sale of public lands and the duties on imports, all the other expenses of the Government were to be paid by the taxes which were classed in the Constitution as direct taxes and paid in proportion to numbers. That was the clear understanding of that time, in my judgment.

But, Mr. President, how has this thing worked? The House of Representatives in asserting this principle and carrying it to an extreme has most seriously and grievously impaired its own power, and has increased the power and control of the Senate, because, as this thing has worked for many years, for a time going beyond the memory of the oldest of us here in service, appropriation bills go into Committee of the Whole. They are discussed under their rules, under a provision by which every detail is open only to five-minute speeches, with one speech on each side and no more. So there is a very limited opportunity of debate. Then the bills go into the House. No vote by yeas and nays is taken in Committee of the Whole and they pass in the House under the previous question without anybody having an opportunity there to offer an amendment.

They then come to the Senate and the Senate adds "amendments as on other bills," to use the constitutional phrase, which makes the power of amendment absolutely unlimited, under full discussion, every member of the Senate knowing what is put in here by the Senate. They then go back to the House of Representatives, are nonconcurred in in a lump, and are referred there to a committee of conference. The reports of those committees are often made at midnight in the last two or three days of the session, and the House of Representatives never knows, never sees in print, never has an opportunity to debate or discuss them, and of course, under the rules, can not amend the reports of those conference committees. So the last person in the country to inquire of, the day after the 4th of March or the day of an adjournment of Congress, what is contained in an appropriation bill is a member of the House of Representatives, unless he has been on the conference committee. He could not find out by inquiry.

The House, therefore, has almost wholly surrendered that great function of the control over the appropriations of this Government, certainly the function of any control by the influence or power of any individual member moving his amendment and stating his objection.

Now, the House of Representatives are proceeding to surrender a further part of that function. That is, for the little, petty advantage, if that be the motive—and I shall not attribute that to the other House, but it is what the public generally attribute—of going on the stump and letting some gentleman who is a candidate for reelection tell his constituents, "We passed an appropriation bill which contained only $10,000,000 and the Senate put on $5,000,000 more. See what an economical body we are and what an extravagant body they are!"—a thing about which I do not believe the people care one snap. I never could see that it ever made any impression on any voter in the country.

The House are further surrendering the opportunity even of originating appropriation bills in regard to the great subject of public expenditures. They send up here a bill in regard to a class of public expenditures where they have not exercised their function of originating and shaping the amendment in the time when they have the debates in the other House upon it, and they surrender that power to the Senate. I do not see why my honorable and wise friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], as a Senator and a man whose fame and reputation and public service are identified with the power and dignity and authority of this body, wants to interfere with the House of Representatives if they want to do that. Let them send all their appropriation bills here in blank, or with nothing but an appropriation for paper and twine for their own use, and let us fill up the rest, if they choose. They have given up to us the greatest single function in the legislation of government; that is, the power of originating and giving the first shape to the appropriations which we are to pass.

If I were a member of the House of Representatives I should have something to say, I think, on that subject in opposition; but being a Senator and thinking that that class of expenditure is pretty wisely and well managed under the lead of my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and his associates on the Appropriations Committee, if the House want to surrender this function to us, I say, let them do it, and we will take it. I am not afraid of it, and I am not afraid that the people of the United States do not know enough about their Constitution to know when the House of Representatives omit to pass a provision for lighting St. Elizabeth's Hospital, or for completing the Library of Congress, or for paying the judgments of the Court of Claims, or providing for the expenditures of the Department of Justice all over the country, and send a bill up to the Senate—the people understand perfectly well that it is not a fault but a virtue in the Senate to add the proper appropriations to the bill; and they will think no less of any Senator, but very much less of the Representatives who have anything to do with that thing.

So I say again, if the House of Representatives choose to surrender this function to us, let us take it, and we will practically carry out the constitutional view of my honorable friend from Connecticut and my honorable friend from Ohio, which the House of Representatives have succeeded in baffling so long.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words upon these deficiency appropriations. It is impossible that the views of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] shall prevail. The circuit and district courts of the United States for the State of Florida, I am informed by the United States marshal, are now in session, with a large number of witnesses, and are about to be compelled to adjourn, having gone to great expense in partially attending to the business of the court, for want of funds, because the appropriations have been necessarily exceeded by events which could not be foreseen owing to the increased number of cases and the increased number of witnesses, which no possible anticipation could have discerned or provided for.

In reference to the question as to the power of the Senate, the Constitution is of perpetual obligation. No custom can destroy its obligation and its provision. The Constitution makes but one limitation upon the legislative power in this body, and that is upon the orginiating of revenue bills, the laying of taxes, but not appropriations. The whole body of legislative power in the Senate consists in making appropriations. Every committee can originate a bill and bring it to the Senate, and can provide for the appropriation of money; and that is its function. If you deprive it of that, there is no Senate.

So the distinction between an individual bill and the collection of the work of the separate committees into a bill which may be called a general deficiency appropriation bill is not a distinction in principle; it has no place in the Constitution in the discrimination of legislative power. Therefore, to my mind there is nothing in the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut except that if he be right in his proposition, either as a matter of expediency or as a matter of law governing legislative power, this body is divested of its entire functions except those that pertain to the executive department in the confirmation of persons nominated for office.

Therefore there is no force in the objection that the Senate fails to perform its constitutional duty when it makes an appropriation for the necessary expenses of the Government. There can be no question that when my judgment is satisfied that an appropriation is inadequate to the proper maintenance of the Government it is my duty as a Senator, and it is an obligation which I can not avoid, to make that appropriation adequate for the necessary and proper purposes of the Government, whether the House of Representatives has or has not taken action upon it.

In regard, however, to the deficiencies appropriated for in this bill, and especially those in relation to the Department of Justice, I wish to say that in my own State now at this moment the marshal telegraphs me that there is an entire want of funds, and that unless this bill passes, and passes immediately, the courts must disband and the prisoners either be turned loose or their maintenance provided for by the private credit and funds of the officials.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five"; so as to make the clause read:

To enable the International Boundary Commission, appointed under the conventions of July 29, 1882, and February 18, 1889, to complete the survey and remarking of the boundary between the United States and Mexico by the preparation of the manuscripts, including tables and results, for the joint report, together with a map of the survey covering a belt of territory 2½ miles wide on the American side of the boundary, to be incorporated with a similar map of the Mexican territory prepared by the Mexican section of the Commission; also the preparation of the special reports of the American section, including astronomical and geodetic tables and results, and a geographical map, a work requiring the employment of expert draftsmen, a clerk, the rent of an office, and the expenses of the Commissioners, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 2, to insert:

For the preparation of the report by Dr. E. A. Mearns, United States Army, with accompanying illustrations, of the natural history of the region covered by the survey of the boundary between the United States and Mexico, under the conventions of July 29, 1882, and February 18, 1889, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 14, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Matt W. Ransom, out of the appropriation for "Salaries of ambassadors and ministers," 1896, the sum of $2,806.48, being the amount of the salary of the minister to Mexico from July 1 to August 28, 1895, during which period he performed the duties of minister to Mexico and has received no compensation therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 24, under the head of "Treasury Department," to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporarily in the Treasury Department, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, not exceeding 25 expert money counters, at a rate not exceeding $80 per month each, $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to ask for some information as to that amendment? I see no reference to it in the report of the committee.

Mr. HALE. It is merely for arrearages which have accumulated in the Treasury Department in the counting of the old currency which has come in. It is covered by Senate Document No. 93 of the present session.

I will state to the Senator, if he does not desire to have the document read, that the Secretary of the Treasury came before the committee and stated what the actual trouble was, and that he needed this force in disposing of the bills which came in. We thought it was a very moderate amount, and reported in favor of giving it to him.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to understand this matter, and should like to be taken into the confidence of the Secretary of the Treasury and the committee before I vote upon the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a draft of a joint resolution providing for the temporary appointment of expert money counters, who through former experience are capable of detecting counterfeits and have become expert in the handling of public money in this Department, in order to bring up the work of counting and assorting currency sent to the Department for redemption, which is now $7,500,000 in arrears, and to request that said resolution be enacted into law as early as practicable.

The imperative necessity for the employment of the persons referred to is owing to the fact that this large quantity of uncounted money is now in the Department awaiting counting, and the owners are deprived of its use or any credit thereon. The accumulation of uncounted funds is brought about by a reduction in the regular force employed for the purpose through the decision of the Auditor for the Treasury Department that, under the act of August 5, 1882, there was no legal authority for the employment of 64 money counters then in the service and paid from the appropriation contained in the act of July 14, 1890, known as the "Sherman Act."

When this decision was promulgated the services of all the counters then on that roll was immediately dispensed with.

The Department is aware that some of those expert money counters are now in the city, and provision is made in the joint resolution for the immediate appointment of such as are best qualified as experts in that line of duty. Application has also been made for permanent provision for this assistance under the regular organization of the Department, but much time must necessarily elapse before the Civil Service Commission could order and hold an examination, mark the papers of the applicants, and obtain an eligible list, even were the necessary legislation already in force.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HALE. I can add nothing to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee thought it furnished ample ground for putting the appropriation in the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Undoubtedly. I am not questioning the authority of the committee, but what I was trying to get at was this: The national-bank notes, as I understand, are redeemable at the Treasury in greenbacks.

Mr. ALDRICH. In lawful money.

Mr. DANIEL. Lawful money. Greenbacks are secured for the national-bank notes, and they are then presented and gold is taken out. The question with me was whether or not this additional force would not be made effectual to accelerate, aid, and abet the raids which we have had upon our gold reserve, resulting in the issue of additional bonds upon the people of the United States, and to suggest that it might be well in some of our financial bills—though I hardly see that it would be apropos now, and it is not, except by way of suggestion—to make such arrangement as to require the national banks to redeem their own notes, and not to facilitate this continual raid upon our Treasury and continual building up of a great public debt.

I shall not vote against the amendment, and I did not intend, in calling for the explanation, to make the least criticism upon the committee, which could hardly have done otherwise than it did; but this amendment covers what is an evil in our present system, and I desired to call attention to it in this connection.

Mr. ALLISON. It will be observed in the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury that he says but 64 counters were formerly employed and paid for under the provisions in the act of 1890. The First Auditor of the Treasury decided that they could not properly be paid for out of that fund. I think the Auditor's decision was a correct one. These expert counters not only count national-banks notes, but greenbacks and Treasury notes, silver certificates, and every form of mutilated currency that appears at the Treasury, and new and fresh currency is issued in lieu of the mutilated currency which is so destroyed. Now, when that currency comes in, it must remain until it is counted, and if there is any deficiency in the number of people who are counting the money, of course the money is out of circulation and is not even accounted for in the Treasury balances. So it seemed the Secretary made a very good case. He wanted to pay the counters out of the fund provided by the act of 1890, which the committee thought an unwise provision, and therefore it is proposed to appropriate the money from the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am glad that the diligent and vigilant Senator from Virginia has called attention to this item, because it leads us to the contemplation, through the means of the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the overworked condition of the Civil Service Commission. The Secretary says that there is no time for him to get this additional force through the examinations under the civil-service rules, and therefore the committee, very properly, as I conceive, authorize him to select these expert money counters, male or female, as the case may be, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Now, right here, Mr. President, we see this much-vaunted Civil Service Commission, which I favor (I am only led to regret that it is so inadequate to the work before it), may be relieved of the duty of furnishing the expert money counters to whom the $7,500 is to be paid.

I had supposed that under the civil-service system the Commission had already examined a force of competent persons to be assigned to the different Departments when their services are wanted. I had supposed that they had, so to speak, material on hand all the time. Yet here we discover that the Commission has broken down on a few money counters, not experts in literature, not experts in geography, or in mechanics, or any other science, but expert money counters. The Civil Service Commission can not furnish them, and so Congress is appealed to to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to find the expert money counters without being hampered and limited by the civil-service rules.

Mr. President, I commend the committee (which needs commendation and help at this time as much as it ever did in its life) for granting this very proper request of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I shall support with pleasure. I assure you, Mr. President, that I shall recommend no money counter to him if this provision passes. I commend the committee for giving to the Secretary these expert counters whom he wants, and I only regret the feeble and dilapidated condition in which the Civil Service Commission finds itself because it can not do this work in order to enable the great bundles of money, which have laid there so long uncounted, to be promptly counted, and, as the chairman of the committee well said, paid for under the provisions of the act of 1890. It is of importance that the counting should be paid for from the right act.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in regard to what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, I think the giving of these money counters in this way, and removing them from the laws applicable to all other persons employed in the Department, can not be owing to the decrepit state of the Commission, because I am very certain that the registers and waiting lists of the Commission are amply supplied, and that there are a great many persons who have passed examination on those eligible lists who have been waiting some time for appointment, and from whom these persons could be perfectly well selected. The reason for taking them out of the law in this way I do not think can have anything to do with the decrepitude of the Civil Service Commission. I think it can only be done because the Secretary of the Treasury prefers to appoint them in this manner.

I have no desire to interfere with a little bit of patronage if the Secretary wants it, and I suppose that that is what it all amounts to, as it is merely a temporary appointment; but I think it should be known that these persons could be taken perfectly well from the eligible lists of those who are waiting for appointments and who have been examined with a view to being appointed to the departmental service.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I think so far from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts being accurate, it is just the reverse. The Secretary of the Treasury does not desire this appropriation for the small amount of patronage conferred upon him. On the contrary, he has faithfully observed, I understand, the civil-service rules in all the appointments in his Department. But he finds in this case, as in quite a number of others which have occurred, that the civil-service rules and regulations operate to the detriment of the Government work; that if he were to rely upon the appointments made through that source he would be compelled to appoint ladies who were not skilled in the work, and it would require several months for them to become adepts in it.

No examination by the Civil Service Commission will determine the qualifications of a lady or a gentleman for this particular work. That can only be ascertained and the acquirements can be had only by actual practice. The Secretary of the Treasury had a corps of skilled persons engaged in this work. Unfortunately, the appropriation was small and he was compelled to dispense with their services, and the time has arrived when it is absolutely necessary to have a skilled force. He can not get them through the Civil Service Commission, and therefore he requests an appropriation to enable him, outside of that service, to employ these skilled persons, who otherwise could not be obtained.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury has applied to the Civil Service Commission and has been informed by them that they can not supply him with suitable money counters?

Mr. GORMAN. No; I do not make that statement; but I mean to say that the persons on the eligible list of the Civil Service Commission have never had experience and are not expert counters.

Mr. LODGE. How can the Secretary know if he has never inquired?

Mr. GORMAN. Oh, he understands, as we all do, that anyone can take that examination, whether he has ever had any experience or not. The examination does not embrace the actual skill in counting. It is one of those cases for which provision must be made, and this is not done for the purpose of getting a few appointments, but it is to facilitate the business of the country.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Secretary of the Treasury to say practically that it was necessary to have people who could quickly discern counterfeit money and who could count rapidly, and that such people are not on the eligible list, but that 64 people had been employed under the act of 1890 and were experts, and, therefore, without waiting for them to pass through the routine of the civil service and some of the impediments with which the Senator is familiar, it would be necessary for him now temporarily—that is, for the remainder of the present fiscal year (and that is all this item applies to)—to secure these expert counters by making such an inquiry as would secure them.

Mr. LODGE. I understand, then, he is simply going to make reappointments?

Mr. ALLISON. He said he would select from the 64 expert people.

Mr. LODGE. That is, he is going to reappoint persons who have already had experience in counting money?

Mr. ALLISON. I gathered precisely that from his statement.

Mr. LODGE. They are not to be new appointments?

Mr. ALLISON. Not new ones.

Mr. HALE. It simply shows that in the inscrutable dispensations of Providence occasionally there will come instances where there can be some exercise of human judgment and prevision outside of the board of Civil Service Commissioners. How it is that in the revolution of the spheres and the ordinary transactions of human life it has come about that the Government can run without the merciful dispensations of that board I am unable to comprehend, but that it has come to that I know and believe. Perhaps it is because that board of gentlemen has had upon it lately a new and green infusion, and that it is not so saturated with that elemental view of the transcendent superiority of that organization to all other human organizations as it will be when experience has been had. That I do not know, but we are unaccountably confronted with the fact that even the advocates of the absolute infallibility of that board are obliged to admit that here is an exception, and that we can get a man or a woman into the Department who will do his or her duty without going before that board.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Before the amendment passes finally, I merely wish to say that I did not mean to imply that expert money counters or other officers could not be gotten by the Treasury Department outside of the civil-service rules. The present Secretary of the Treasury has shown great capacity in that respect, disregarding the rules on many occasions, and I have no doubt he has obtained very suitable persons. I do not wish it to be supposed that I in the least grudge this very small morsel of patronage to the present dispensers of it. I am sure I think they need all they can get.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, before the pending amendment is placed on the bill, a remark has been made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] which it occurs to me needs some explanation. The Senator, as I understood him, said that the civil-service law was being carried out to its full extent by the Treasury Department.

Mr. GORMAN. As far as I know.

Mr. ALLEN. Now the Senator says as far as he knows, which is quite a qualification. I do not know much about the Treasury Department; I have but very little business with it, and no patronage connected with it; but I do know that there is universal complaint; perhaps I should not use that word—but there is general complaint that in every Department of the Government in this city the civil-service law is of constant and daily abuse, not only in the Treasury Department, but in every other Department. For instance, I understand it to be a common thing, and I never yet have heard it denied in this Chamber or elsewhere, for the head of a Department or some person standing close to him to indicate to employees of that Department, if they happen to be of a different political faith from the head of the Department, that the exigencies of the public service require them to take a reduced position.

If they are drawing a salary of $1,800 a year and happen to be Republicans under a Democratic Administration, they are very frequently required to take a subordinate position of seven or eight hundred dollars a year, and vice versa; and not infrequently where a position is wanted (of course to carry out the benefits of the civil-service law and not for party purposes) the occupant of the office is informed that his or her resignation would be acceptable; and if they are stubborn enough to persist in holding the office under the protecting shield of the civil-service statutes, they find eventually that their office is entirely abolished by order of the head of the Department, and they are permitted to walk out into the cold and seek employment elsewhere. I think it is due to the country at large that these facts should be understood. That is quite a common practice in all the different Departments of the Government, not only as they are represented in the city of Washington, but elsewhere.

Mr. GORMAN. Does the Senator from Nebraska understand that that is done in violation of the letter of the law? Can it not be done in conformity with the statute itself?

Mr. ALLEN. I understand it is in violation not only of the law, but preeminently in violation of the spirit of the law, and the spirit of the law is always the law when it is properly construed, for when the reason of the law ceases the law itself ceases. I am not very familiar with the beautiful workings of the system of the civil service. I infer, however, that the honorable Senator from Maryland, who stands so close to the Chief Executive, who is himself preeminently the advocate of this system, understands its beneficent workings and that he could enlighten the Senate and the country upon that subject.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I should like to disabuse his mind. If he has had that impression, he is the only one in the United States who has had it. I have had no connection whatever with the civil-service law. I do not think that is my reputation.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to be corrected. Mr. President, occasionally there has come in my mind the thought that possibly this law is being abused in some respects. I have sometimes thought it possible that the advocates were not really serious about its enforcement. I have thought at times that if the civil-service law, so called (for it is so only in name and not in fact, as I believe), were enforced in its full intent and purpose, in less than a third of a century this Government would be turned over entirely to a lot of cigarette-smoking dudes, whose only capacity for government in all its different forms would be their ability to tell whether "copy" should be spelled with one "p" or two "p's." I believe it to be one of the gigantic frauds of the age.

Mr. CHANDLER. Which way would you spell it?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that I would spell it. I do not know that I would be eligible under the civil-service regulations to a position. But certainly, Mr. President, speaking seriously, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who does not know that the civil-service law is violated in its letter and its spirit every day. I can well understand how, in view of the encroachments of corporations and money influences upon this Government in its different departments, there can keep even pace with those encroachments a disposition to turn the Government over into the hands of a few men whose mere book education, limited as that may be, is their only recommendation for positions of honor and trust. Under this law a curly-headed youth of 21 or 22 years of age——

Mr. CALL. He need not be curly headed.

Mr. ALLEN. That was not meant at all as a reflection. [Laughter.] A youth of that kind, whose only fitness for public position is that he had been turned out, twisted in proper shape, by some common school, can meet advancement and promotion in the discharge of public duties and in the public service, whereas the man who has not enjoyed the opportunities he has enjoyed and who has given a lifetime in qualifying himself for the discharge of some particular branch of the public service is entirely ignored.

Mr. GORMAN. That is the case we are providing for now.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Maryland suggests that that is the very case we are providing for now. I heard the Senator from Maryland say a moment ago that the persons who are upon the eligible list, as he calls it, of the Civil Service Commission are not competent to discharge this duty; that this is one of the duties they are not competent to discharge; that among their duties in the counting of this money was their ability to discover counterfeit money readily and without the waste of much time. I suppose if that were true the best policy to be pursued would be to go to a school of counterfeiting and get the experts there and put them into the public service.

I rose, however, Mr. President, for the purpose of saying (and I do not know whether it is wise for me to say it or not from a personal standpoint, but I will take the chances anyway) that two of the most gigantic and useless institutions in this country that are constantly absorbing the public funds for their support are the Civil Service and Interstate Commerce Commissions. Here is the Interstate Commerce Commission, to which no man can be appointed unless his opinion is known in advance upon the subject of the Government control of railways. I say this with no disrespect to any gentleman upon the Commission, for I know none of them personally. It must be understood that his opinion is consistent with the interests of the railroads before he is ever elevated to a position of that kind. And what jurisdiction have the Interstate Commerce Commission? What power have they? They have the power to draw their salaries, and that is about the extent of it. A question is submitted to them; they pass upon it in a quasi judicial capacity, and they are as powerless as an infant six months of age to carry into execution their judgments and findings.

Look, if you will, at the Civil Service Commission. Whenever a Civil Service Commissioner develops the slightest amount of backbone or independence and believes that the law should be carried out in its letter and spirit and acts slightly independent of the ruling power, that moment he hears a voice from the White House telling him there is a vacancy in the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission is simply an instrument, a living instrument, in the hands of the ruling power to carry out its bidding.

Now, I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be given the power that it is proposed in this amendment to give him. I believe if the civil-service law is obnoxious to the people it ought to be made more so by being lived up to, and the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be required to go to the list furnished by the Civil Service Commission for his assistants in this case.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska takes an entirely erroneous view of this subject. The present Administration has extended the civil-service law and made it to embrace almost every possible employment, even the most inferior employment, and graded them according to the salaries, so that it is almost impossible, in the most meritorious cases, for a member of Congress, who may happen to have a constituent here who is needy and deserving and capable, to obtain any kind of employment for him. Therefore the criticism that the Administration or the Executive in power uses or may use the civil service for his own purposes is entirely without foundation.

Now, I am not an advocate of the present system of civil service. I think it is open to a great many objections, and if I had the power I would institute an entirely different system of eligibility and of continuance in office during good behavior, leaving the power to remove where it is now. But to say that at this time and under this Administration there have been abuses of the civil service in admitting persons into it contrary to the rule is, in my judgment, entirely inaccurate. The complaint has been that they have failed to appoint to office men of their own political faith.

I think it is the general impression throughout the country of those who have observed matters here that those persons belonging to the political party of the Executive and the Cabinet officers have not had any kind of favor shown to them. That may be very right in the administration of the civil-service law, but, in my judgment, it is a correct criticism. There has not been any kind of favor shown to the members of the political party in power. The action of the Executive has been to extend and cover almost every possible employment under the Government with the civil-service rules and require an examination. I believe, and I think I may say with perfect confidence, that so far as my own State is concerned, a great injustice has been done under the civil-service rules in their strict and rigid application and enforcement by excluding persons who ought to have been admitted as eligible upon its list.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the Senator well know that under this Administration and under previous Administrations, too, for that matter, it has been a common practice not to take the applicants according to the order in which they stand on the eligible list, but to jump way down the list over the first, second, third, and fourth and select some political favorites for the different positions? Has not that been the common practice?

Mr. CALL. I do not think it has been the common practice. If the Senator were Secretary of the Treasury or Secretary of any one of the different Departments and were required to determine as to the efficiency of a person for a particular duty and were confined to the list of eligibles, he would go on down the list until he found some one who was satisfactory to his judgment. There may have been abuses under this system, there are abuses under everything, but in my judgment the civil-service law and its rules have been unwisely extended and unwisely made rigid, and so a great number of people who are more competent to perform the duties, not in school knowledge, not in technical knowledge of books, but in actual capacity and in reasonable intelligence, have been excluded from being eligible to those positions.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida another question.

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not the spirit of the civil-service law that, when the Commission shall have passed upon the eligibility of a candidate and have scheduled the candidates in the order of their application and examination, that becomes conclusive upon the Department into whose service the appointees are to enter?

Mr. CALL. No; that is not the law and it ought not to be the law. It merely makes them eligible and leaves the question of their special competency for special work to the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not believe that.

Mr. CALL. If there were any other law, if you were to make a man absolutely entitled to office because he had a more perfect knowledge of a few books or classes of learning than another one without reference to his special capacity for that work, it would be a great injury to the public service.

Now, in regard to this little matter here, I am not particularly in favor of the Administration in regard to these offices. I think great injustice has been done, but I defend them against the accusation of the Senator. But in regard to these little offices here, how can it be possible that a student who has answered correctly, having more perfect information than others, certain questions relating to arithmetic, or to grammar, or to geography, or to any of the several branches of learning, and who may be entirely proficient in them as a collegiate graduate, can be more expert than others in the counting of money, in the discrimination between the different kinds of money, in ascertaining what is genuine and what is not?

There is nothing in the proposition. It is impossible. Here is a great mass of money waiting. Persons send money to be exchanged, mutilated money, money that is soiled, which they wish to have renewed. It is not in gold, it is not in silver, but in the currency of the country. It is coming from all parts of the country. Are you to wait to take the employees from a list of eligibles who have been questioned in regard to grammar and arithmetic and geography and perhaps some other mathematics, and to be confined to that list? Mr. President, it seems to me there is nothing in this objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the interest in this discussion is purely academic, and I trust that if I occupy a moment or two of time I will not be considered as unduly prolonging the debate upon the measure, which ought to be passed. But I can not let go without protest some remarks made by our friends on the other side. The danger to this country and its interests is not through the Civil Service Commission. It is through the exercise by the Executive and his Cabinet of the power of removal and the power of appointment, which have been mercilessly exercised in the present Administration as never before in the history of the country.

In 1893 there never was a chance to prevent the passage of a free-coinage measure through the House of Representatives, which has now expired and about which I can now speak, had it not been for the power of patronage of the Administration, and especially the power of patronage as exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury. Colorado is to-day flooded with appointments, many of them unfit ones, made by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of Congressmen who ratted on the silver question. Again and again have men whose constituents sent them here to vote for silver gone back upon their pledges to their constituents and their promises because the Administration has offered them the patronage which belonged to it, and which has debauched them, and which they in their turn have sought to use to debauch their constituents.

I will tell you, Mr. President, that whenever we reach a fair administration of the affairs of this country it will be after we have deprived the President of the United States and unscrupulous Cabinet officials of the power of degrading and dishonoring manhood by promising offices for a violation of the pledges which members of Congress have given to their constituents. For my part, I look forward with great pleasure to the time when the civil-service rules shall be so extended as that fitness, and fitness alone, shall govern in the appointment of officers; and when public officers, such as we, shall not be compelled to hang about the doors of Cabinet officers or of the White House like servants to beg for our morsel of public patronage.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am somewhat inclined to make a suggestion, getting down from the sublime to the practical. I think there is a reason why the provision in the bill is more likely to provide efficient and competent clerks, ready to perform their duties in a few hours, than can be provided in any other way. But a short time ago there were 64 clerks in the Treasury Department who had some years of experience in the precise character of work which it is now an absolute necessity should be pressed through at the earliest day convenient.

Now, I chance to know that if the amendment shall be agreed to as it appears in the bill the rule that will be adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury will be that which will look to the efficiency record of those 64 clerks who had long months or years of experience in this precise work and select the 25 persons whose records show them to have been most efficient in the performance of these duties; and those are the persons who will be named as the clerks provided for by the bill.

What commission on earth could take a leap in the dark or guess upon any scholarly investigation as to the particular qualifications required for the specific duties provided for by the amendment that would be so reliable as the years of experience and the record that those persons have made in the performance of these duties? I think it is the wisest method that could possibly be adopted in selecting employees for the emergency that is now upon us. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if it is desired simply to reappoint experienced clerks under this provision, then under the law the Secretary has the power to reinstate, and there is not the slightest need to give him any additional powers as to the rules and methods he may prescribe.

Mr. GORMAN. Not after one year.

Mr. LODGE. He has power to reappoint——

Mr. HARRIS. Not after one year.

Mr. LODGE. Not after one year. If the Secretary desires to make new appointments and not to take them from the eligible list, of course it is necessary.

I spoke first in this matter merely to call attention to a point involved. It was a very small one, but since then, as usual when anything is said about the Civil Service Commission or the civil-service laws, they are made the subject of sneers. I think the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, when a discussion arises in regard to the civil-service rules, are the only places in the United States where education is sneered at. We have sat here this afternoon and listened to sneers at the people who come in because they have learned to read and write, as if it were discreditable to an American citizen to have a proper education, as if there was something in itself that was discreditable in the fact that they have what it is our boast to try to give to every American child, a knowledge of the rudiments of education. We have had it spoken of as un-American.

The discussion may be academic, but I desire to say once more what I have often said both here and in the other House—that patronage and favoritism are un-American. There is nothing you can find in our laws, our history, or our Constitution that makes the system of giving offices by political patronage American. It is, on the contrary, adverse to every American idea. I for one was glad to hear what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] said, with which I most cordially agree. I think a system which obliges the Representatives and Senators of the United States—elected to perform great public duties, which certainly are enough to occupy all their time—to pass their time in the antechambers of Cabinet ministers, hanging around the White House, giving their days and nights to appeals for office, not because the seekers are particularly fit, but on the ground of political service, is a system utterly degrading to the men upon whom it is forced.

We all know that where the offices are left open to patronage and favoritism no man can avoid dealing with them in that way. He is obliged to do so; otherwise his own constituents suffer. But the system is utterly wrong, and the more it is taken away the better it will be, not with a view of getting ideal persons—that is one of the sneers of its opponents—but taking the routine service of the Government out of politics, putting it on some decent and more respectable and more intelligent plane, and leave to the Senators and Representatives the duties for which they were chosen, which is to deal with the great legislative questions before the Government, and not be huckstering for places for messengers and tidewaiters all back and forth through the country.

Mr. HALE. If we can have a vote on the pending amendment, then the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] wants to have a conference report agreed to, and after that I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I should like to have a vote on the pending amendment if there is to be no further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator desires to let the bill go over, all right, but I do not think we can get a vote on this particular amendment immediately.

Mr. HALE. Then I yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and after the conference report is disposed of I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

CHAPLAIN FOR MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 4, and agree to the same.

JOS. R. HAWLEY,
W. J. SEWELL,
E. C. WALTHALL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. A. T. HULL,
GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
J. P. TRACEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. One of the amendments is an amendment to the title, which the conference committee agreed to, of course.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the title be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

A bill to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, providing a chaplain for the Military Academy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 12, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to make a favorable report on the following Senate joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, etc., That the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, which section reads as follows: "There shall be distributed of monographs, bulletins, and reports of the United States Geological Survey, now in possession of said Survey, being publications prior to the year 1894, one copy of every such publication to every public library which shall be designated to the superintendent of documents, as follows: Two public libraries to be designated by each of the Senators from the States, respectively, two public libraries by the Representative in Congress from each Congressional district, and two public libraries by the Delegate from each Territory; such public libraries to be additional to those to which said publications are distributed under existing law," shall be extended to the monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey which were published during the year 1894, and to those which have been published since that year, and to those which may be published in the future: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere with the distribution of memoirs and reports, so far as the same is provided for by the joint resolution "To distribute copies of special memoirs and reports of the United States Geological Survey," approved March 3, 1887.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for no additional printing and no additional expense to the Government. It is simply a provision for the distribution of these monographs, bulletins, and reports as heretofore. The last printing act having made no provision for the distribution beyond 1894, this is simply to continue the distribution. That is all there is of it.

The joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, by a special order of the House to-day has been set apart for the consideration of business reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I beg the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me for a moment, to ask unanimous consent to offer a petition and make a brief statement. I will not occupy more than two minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a petition signed by 10,000 residents of the city of St. Louis, mostly from the district that I have the honor to represent on this floor. They speak, I dare say, not for themselves alone, but for at least 200,000 people, or fully one-third of the inhabitants of that city. The first six names on the petition are the names of well-known members of concerns which alone employ between four and five thousand laboring men.

They ask that the third bridge to be constructed across the Mississippi, and for the construction of which a company is now asking Congress for a charter, shall be located at South St. Louis. There are two bridges now spanning the Mississippi at St. Louis, one in the northern portion of the city and the other in the central portion. The south part of the city—South St. Louis—does not as yet enjoy bridge facilities, and for that reason my constituents ask that they may be granted what the other portions of the city already have.

I trust that there will be favorable consideration of their petition, and I ask unanimous consent that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for action.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4785) to incorporate the National University, and yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], who will explain the provisions of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Arthur MacArthur, Richard H. Alvey, Charles C. Cole, William B. Webb, Eugene Carusi, H. O. Claughton, Thomas Wilson, Matthew G. Emery, John Goode, Charles Lyman, John T. Winter, Howard H. Barker, and William C. Whittemore, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the National University, with power to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and to have perpetual succession; to acquire, take by devise, bequest, or otherwise, hold, purchase, encumber, and convey such real and personal estate as shall be required for the purpose of its incorporation; to make and use a common seal, and the same to alter at pleasure.

SEC. 2. That the aforesaid incorporators shall be and constitute a board of trustees for the said university, seven of whom shall constitute a quorum to do business, and which board shall be, and are, authorized to fill any vacancies in their number, to appoint such officers and agents as the business of the corporation shall require, and to make by-laws for the accomplishment of its purposes, for the management of its property, and for the regulation of its affairs. Said corporation is hereby empowered to establish and maintain within the District of Columbia a university for the promotion of education. The said corporation shall have power to grant and confer diplomas and the usual college and university degrees, and honorary degrees, and also such other powers as may be necessary fully to carry out and execute the general purposes of the said corporation as herein appearing.

SEC. 3. That this act may be amended or repealed at any time by the Congress at its pleasure.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment: In line 8, section 1, after the word "name," insert the word "of."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the committee but a moment.

The object and purpose of the bill is simply to incorporate the National University, which is in the District of Columbia. This institution is already chartered under the general acts of Congress, and has been in operation conducting two of its departments—the law and the medical departments—for more than twenty years.

The bill simply grants a special charter within the District of Columbia, but does not extend the powers or privileges that they now enjoy under the general charter. The only object in changing the form of the charter is because there is now pending a bill, which it is supposed will become a law, making it necessary for such institutions as are not incorporated by special acts of Congress to apply to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for registration and permission before they can have authority to carry on their business. If they have a charter, however, under a special act they do not need to make that application.

Mr. CANNON. This university is now in existence?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; and has been for twenty years and over.

Mr. CANNON. Under what name?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The same name, the National University; and it has two departments in operation.

Mr. CANNON. What additional power does this act bestow?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None at all. They are already operating under an act of Congress passed thirty years ago. This simply puts them under a special law and exempts them from the requirements to which I have just referred.

Mr. CANNON. Is the present charter perpetual?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; this is just the same as the present charter. Of course Congress reserves the right in all these charters to alter or amend at pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. I do not antagonize the bill at all, but I fail to understand the necessity for the legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear what I stated, and I will repeat it. They ask for this charter under a special act of Congress, rather than under the general act, for the reason that there is a bill pending which will be reached directly by the committee, and all favor its passage so far as we know, which, if it becomes a law, will require all these institutions to apply to the District Commissioners for a license and a permit to conduct their affairs. Now, under the general act which is proposed, institutions chartered by special acts of Congress are excepted from its provisions. Therefore they want this special act, rather than a charter under the old law.

Mr. CANNON. That shows, then, that the general law you propose to pass ought not to pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Because in anticipation of its passage you come and ask a special charter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We will hear the gentleman on that when we reach it. That is only one incident in the law, and not the main purpose of it. Therefore this is asked by these gentlemen, some of whom I have no doubt the gentleman will recognize, if he will glance at the names of the incorporators, as leading citizens of the District—Judge MacArthur, Richard H. Alvey, Charles C. Cole, Mr. Claughton, Dr. Howard H. Barker, and others who are well known, being the patrons or managers of these two institutions that I speak of, the one law and the other medical.

Mr. CANNON. This institution has been established by these gentlemen?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has been in existence for more than twenty years with the two departments, a law department and a medical department.

Mr. CANNON. I would ask the gentleman whether there is another institution of this same name or a similar name?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is an institution which has a bill pending here proposing to charter the National University of the United States; but this one is purely a local institution and does not go out of the District. The other, to which my friend refers, I have no doubt, is a bill to charter a great national university, which is to have its operations in all the States of the Union, possibly. This is purely local in its effect.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will state to the gentleman that this is an old institution, in very high standing.

Mr. CANNON. I understand.

Mr. BABCOCK. And they do not want to be put to the necessity of applying for a recharter under the general law. The other institutions here of like standing and age are all incorporated under special charters from Congress.

Mr. CANNON. I will not antagonize the bill, although I will say very frankly I fail to see the necessity for it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope we shall have a vote upon it. There is nobody objecting to it that I know of.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ought to have stated what the amendment is. It is simply verbal. The word "of" was left out, and the committee suggested its insertion; so as to make it read: "The National University of the District of Columbia."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MARYLAND AND WASHINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up the bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the building of the road of said company, under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, calls up the bill H. R. 4810, which the Clerk will report to the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company is required to complete and put in operation its railway in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act approved March 2, 1895, be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of one year from the 2d day of March, 1896; and that all the franchises, rights, and powers conferred by said acts, or either of them, upon said railway company may be enjoyed and exercised as fully and completely as if said railway had been completed and put in operation prior to March 2, 1896.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RUSK] made the report and will explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. RUSK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 87) providing for the extension of the time for the completion of the Washington and Maryland Railway Company, report:

The said company is in good faith rapidly constructing its road, but certain delays have arisen in connection with the condemnation proceedings in the District which may prevent said company from completing its work of construction by the time provided in the act approved March 2, 1896, and your committee therefore think the said Maryland and Washington Railway Company is entitled to the relief prayed, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for joint resolution No. 87.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, this bill relates to the Washington end of the electric railroad now being regularly constructed between the cities of Baltimore and Washington. Certain legal delays prevent it from being completed within the time specified in the provisions of the act. It was necessary to acquire 13,000 feet more within the District of Columbia. The company has 11,300 feet and has about concluded proceedings relating to 700 feet more, leaving only 1,600 feet on Rhode Island avenue yet to be acquired, and it is the legal proceedings in reference to the condemnation of this 1,600 feet that may cause the delay. Upon 11,300 feet of the 13,000 feet the railroad has been constructed, and its construction has been made along the entire line between the city of Baltimore and Washington. It is only by reason of these legal delays that this company asks this extension, lest the delays of the appeals now pending on Rhode Island avenue should be prolonged beyond the time specified in this charter.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman state what route this road proceeds through the city as expressed by the authority given for its construction?

Mr. RUSK. On Rhode Island avenue to North Capitol street. The company acquires a right of way and donates it on Rhode Island avenue as it is acquired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is all they occupy in the District?

Mr. RUSK. That is all. Mr. Speaker, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say that the committee have reported a substitute for the joint resolution.

Mr. RUSK. This is the substitute that was reported for the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is what has been read to the House, is it not?

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the joint resolution lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LICENSE OF BILLIARD AND POOL TABLES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 5490) to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to keep any billiard table, bagatelle table, shuffleboard, jenny lind table, pool table, or any table upon which legitimate games are played, in any saloon, room, or place of business within the District of Columbia for public use or for profit or gain, without a license therefor first had and obtained from the assessor of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That every person taking out such license shall pay to the collector of taxes of said District a license fee of $12 per annum for each table. Said license may be granted or refused in the discretion of the assessor of said District, and all licenses so granted shall date from the 1st day of the month in which the liability began and expire on the 1st day of October in each year: Provided, That in all cases of refusal of said assessor to grant said license, or upon written protest of a majority or more of the property owners or residents of the block in which it is proposed to grant such license, an appeal may be taken to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, whose decision shall be final.

SEC. 3. That every person who shall own, keep, or use any billiard table, bagatelle table, pool table, or any table or board of the kind mentioned in the first section of this act, for public use or profit, without such license first had and obtained, shall, on conviction in the police court, be fined $20 or imprisoned not exceeding three months for each offense, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That it shall not be lawful for the proprietors of billiard tables, pool tables, bagatelle tables, jenny lind tables, or other tables of the kind mentioned in the first section of this act, shuffleboards and bowling alleys, kept for public hire and gain in the District of Columbia, to allow any person under the age of 21 years to play at any game of billiards, pool, shuffleboard, or any game that may be played on such tables or boards, or play at bowls on said alleys, or permit such person to come into or remain in their pool rooms, saloons, or bowling alleys, where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are sold; and all such places shall be closed during the entire twenty-four hours of each and every Sunday, and also during the hours that barrooms are required to be closed.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than forty dollars, and shall in addition forfeit his or her license, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the report of the committee be read.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS of Iowa) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4148) entitled "A bill to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," having fully considered the same, beg leave to submit a substitute, with the recommendation that it do pass, and that the original bill be laid upon the table.

The present law on this subject only imposes a penalty for the keeping of billiard tables, pool tables, etc., for public use, profit, or gain. Under the decision of the courts the present law is essentially a revenue law, a tender of the tax is a constructive payment, and persons paying the tax or tendering the same are permitted to carry on the business without a license. The authorities are thus denied the power to prevent the conduct of such business by improper persons or at unsuitable places. This bill is designed to impose a penalty on persons doing said business without a license, and to provide necessary authority to exclude unworthy applicants by refusing to license them.

This bill differs from the original bill as recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia only in the following particulars:

First. The committee add to section 2 the following provision:

"That in all cases of refusal of said assessor to grant said license, or upon written protest of a majority or more of the property owners or residents of the block in which it is proposed to grant such license, an appeal may be taken to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, whose decision shall be final."

Second. The committee change section 4 of the bill by adding after the word "alleys," in the tenth line, the words "where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are sold," thus providing that it shall not be unlawful for the said proprietors of said tables, etc., to permit persons under 21 years of age to play at said games or visit such places where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are not sold.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I notice an error of the printer in the tenth line of the fourth section. There should be an amendment after the word "pool." It should read instead of "pool rooms, saloons, bowling alleys," "pool or billiard rooms"; insert the words "or billiards" between the words "pool" and "rooms," in the tenth line.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. What change is made in the existing law by this bill?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I will briefly explain the bill. The present law upon this subject is chapter 40 of section 29, and is as follows:

Proprietors of billiard tables, bagatelle, and jenny lind tables, for public hire and gain, and shuffle boards, shall pay $10 annually for each table or board.

It will be seen by the provisions of the law that the authorities are denied the power to prevent the location of such billiard tables or pool tables in undesirable places and by unsatisfactory persons. Under the decision of the courts the present law is essentially a revenue law, and the tender of the tax is construed a constructive payment; hence the bill is unanimously recommended by the Commissioners, and the substitute recommended by the Commissioners only differs from the original bill in two particulars, which are named in the bill. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the bill is thoroughly well understood. If any gentleman present desires to ask any question I shall be pleased to respond.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question or two in regard to this bill. Does the law of the District of Columbia at the present time permit the running of a billiard table in the same room where liquors are sold?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think it does.

Mr. RAY. Well, now, does your bill that you now report and ask to have passed and which is being considered, permit the running of pool tables and billiard tables in the same room where liquors are sold?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There is no change in the present law in that regard. The only law that I have been able to discover in the statutes upon this subject is the one which I read, by which it will be seen that parties who desire to do so may establish billiard rooms anywhere, and the authorities of the District are denied the power to prevent the location of such billiard tables, pool tables, or bagatelle tables anywhere within the precincts of the city.

Mr. RAY. Well, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of any measure by the American Congress which either directly or impliedly permits the conduct of a pool table or a billiard table or anything of that kind in the same room where liquors are permitted to be sold is very objectionable. In the State of New York we have prohibited it and the result has been great good. In my judgment there is nothing more detrimental to the interests, to the peace and harmony of society, nothing more detrimental to the young men of the country, than permitting the conduct of pool tables, billiard tables, and other games and amusements of that character in the same room where liquor is sold. These games bring the young men together, who get excited; then the temptation is to ask each other to "have a drink," and the result is demoralization, especially of the young men, and frequently intoxication and the commission of crime. I believe, therefore, that the Committee on the District of Columbia would do the people of this District a great good if they would so amend this bill as to prohibit absolutely the conduct of a billiard table or a pool table, or anything of that character, in the same room where liquors are permitted to be sold. What objection can there be to an amendment of that kind?

Mr. BABCOCK. The committee in considering this matter did not take up the excise question at all. That is an entirely different subject, having no relation to this bill. Under the present law the Commissioners have no authority to deny a license for a billiard room. Anybody can tender his money and obtain a license authorizing him to open a billiard room. The committee have stated clearly why the pending bill is necessary, and I hope the gentleman will not embarrass its passage by insisting upon such an amendment. If he would put his proposition into a separate bill I would heartily support it, but the pending measure is a very necessary one and I trust the gentleman will not delay its passage by trying to amend it in that way. Let him prepare a separate bill and I can promise him that it will receive the prompt consideration of the committee.

Mr. RAY. But, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Committee on the District of Columbia is by this bill dealing with the subject of pool and billiard tables. Is not that true?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir; but not with the question of liquor selling; not with the excise law.

Mr. RAY. It seems to me that while we are dealing with the subject of pool and billiard tables we might as well legislate wisely upon that subject, might as well strike at the evil, if an evil exists, and it certainly is conceded by the chairman of the committee, and will, I think, be conceded by all good men, that the conduct of billiard tables or pool tables ought not to be permitted in any room where liquors are sold. I do not believe that a prohibition such as I have suggested in the form of an amendment will embarrass this measure in any way; and as the chairman of the committee concedes that if the amendment were in the form of an independent measure he would heartily support it, I can see no good reason why he should not support it now, or why it should not be adopted. I therefore move that the pending bill be amended by striking out of section 4, commencing in line 5 of that section, the words:

To allow any person under the age of 21 years to play at any game of billiards, pool, shuffleboard, or any game that may be played on such tables or boards, or play at bowls on said alleys, or permit such persons to come into or remain in their pool rooms, saloons, or bowling alleys, where spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors are sold.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

To sell or to allow to be sold on said premises spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors.

That amendment will have a tendency to correct the evil of which I have spoken. It can do no harm and it will certainly result in very great good. It ought to be the law of this District.

Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to read the section as it will read if this amendment is adopted:

SEC. 4. That it shall not be lawful for the proprietors of billiard tables, pool tables, bagatelle tables, jenny lind tables, or other tables of the kind mentioned in the first section of this act, shuffleboards and bowling alleys, kept for public hire and gain in the District of Columbia, to sell or to allow to be sold on said premises, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors; and all such places shall be closed during the entire twenty-four hours of each and every Sunday, and also during the hours that barrooms are required to be closed.

Any person violating the provisions of this section shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than five nor more than forty dollars, and shall in addition forfeit his or her license, in the discretion of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that his amendment is very broad. It says "on the said premises." The question is, what will be held to be included in the word "premises." I understand the gentleman's object is to prevent the playing of these games in the same room where liquor is sold, and I suggest that, if he will, he modify his amendment in that way. I do not suppose there will be any objection to it. "Premises" might mean a whole block.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, if I had my way I would not permit the sale of any kind of intoxicating liquor in the same building where pool, billiards, or any of these games are conducted, but my present purpose is to prevent the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors in the same room where these games are carried on, or in any room connected therewith and opening into such room. I will modify my amendment, if that is acceptable, so that instead of the words "to be sold on said premises" the language shall be "to be sold in the same room or in a room opening out of," etc.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman please put his amendment in writing?

Mr. RAY. I will do so. I do not think the committee will oppose an amendment prohibiting the sale of liquors in the same room or in any room connected with or opening out of a room in which any of these games are conducted.

The amendment of Mr. RAY, having been reduced to writing, was read, as follows:

In section 4 strike out all after the words "District of Columbia," in line 5, down to and including the word "sold," in line 11, and insert the following: "To sell or to allow to be sold in the same room or a room connected with and opening out of or adjacent to such room spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, allow me to state the evil which this bill was introduced to correct. Under the present law the authorities of the District have no control of billiard rooms and that class of establishments mentioned in the bill. The purpose of this bill was to give such control that these establishments might be under wholesome regulations. I fear that the amendment just read would not only defeat the original purpose of the bill, but would interfere with nearly every licensed place in the city where liquor is sold, including many of the hotels. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I can not see how the adoption of this amendment is to interfere with any of the rights of hotel keepers and saloon keepers in this District, nor can I see how it will peril the passage of the bill. We are now by this proposed legislation dealing directly with pool tables, billiard tables, shuffle boards, and all other kinds of machinery found in places which are largely resorted to by young men—the names of most of these appliances being quite unfamiliar to me. While we are dealing with this subject, it seems to me that we ought to deal with it sensibly and properly, in the interest of morality, and, I might say, of decency.

Mr. Speaker, every man in this House will concede that spirituous and malt liquors ought not to be sold in the same room or on the same premises where the shuffle boards, billiard tables, etc., are placed for public use, where young men are invited to congregate; where they do congregate. If liquors are sold at all it ought to be done in a room where no other business is conducted or carried on, unless it be to sell liquors in connection with the serving of meals.

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think there is any greater objection to selling liquor in the places to which he refers than to selling it in the House of Representatives?

Mr. RAY. I have not discovered, Mr. Speaker, that spirituous or malt liquors are sold in the House of Representatives. If the gentleman has discovered that fact I trust he will make it known to the members of this House, so that we can cure the evil.

But I am opposed, and I trust this House is opposed, to the enactment of any law that will directly or impliedly permit the conduct of any of these tables to which the bill refers in the same room where intoxicating liquors are sold. To allow any such thing is a recognition by the American Congress of the doctrine that young men may be corrupted at will and without hindrance in the District of Columbia. It is the recognition of a bad principle——

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman understand that the language he proposes to strike from this bill by his amendment was what the subcommittee, after two weeks of patient examination, inserted in the bill to prevent minors going into rooms where billiard tables are used, whether liquor is sold there or not? The subject has been carefully considered by the Senate committee and a measure identically the same as this has been reported at the other end of the Capitol. But the gentleman's amendment strikes from the bill the language which our committee has considered absolutely necessary to protect minors—to keep them out of rooms where liquors are sold.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of participating in the consultations of this committee. But there will be no harm done to the young men of this country by permitting them to visit a room where billiards are played, if that place is a proper place, and if it is disconnected from vicious associations—if these tables are conducted at places where intoxicating liquors are not sold. Shut out intoxicating liquors from these billiard rooms and you may let our young men gather there with perfect impunity; they will suffer no harm. But if you permit the sale of liquors of any character in rooms where you allow billiards to be played, and these other tables to be conducted, it will be in vain that you attempt to shut out young men.

The penalty proposed in this bill for the violation of section 4 is entirely inadequate. The penalty is merely $5. Who would pay any regard to a law with so trivial a penalty? If a boy of 5, 10, 12, or 14 years of age should visit one of these places it might not be noticed; but suppose that a child 10 years of age should stray into a billiard room, would the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] fine him?

What is the object of keeping young men under 21 years of age out of a billiard room? Is there anything wrong, immoral, or vicious in simply playing billiards? I think not. The vice lies in permitting billiards to be played and these tables to be conducted in the same room or rooms where liquors of any description are sold, where vicious associations are met.

The bill will be vastly improved by striking out the language to which I have directed attention and by inserting the proposition embraced in my amendment. The interests of young men will be conserved, the interest of all citizens of this District will be promoted. It will be a step in the right direction. It will not interfere with the rights of any man in the District of Columbia or of any minor in this District. The adoption of the amendment will carry happiness, I think, to all the firesides and homes of this District as well as to many people just outside of the District.

Now, I am not a Prohibitionist; I am not a temperance crank; but I do have an interest in the young men all over this land; I do have an interest in the young men dwelling in this city, and I do not care whether they are just under 21 years, or whether they have passed beyond the age of 21; I do not care whether the persons who visit billiard rooms be gray-headed or boys upon whose cheeks bloom the tints of youth. I say that wherever billiards are played, wherever shuffle boards are conducted, wherever any of these games are permitted to be carried on, we should prohibit the sale of all intoxicating liquors of every description, and at any rate, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect and deference to the committee, with all due consideration for their labors, I shall ask that the sense of the House be tested on this question whether or not the Congress of the United States will permit the sale of any kind of intoxicating liquors in the same room and in the same place where billiards and similar games are allowed to be played.

Let the saloon stand on its own legs. Let the billiard rooms stand on their merits; let the attractions and benefits of this amusement be its recommendation and attract its patronage if you will, but keep these places free from the contaminating influences of the bar room and the sale of intoxicating liquors. The world is moving, and in many of the States the law is as this amendment proposes to establish it here in the District of Columbia. This Congress can not keep step with the general advancement of morality and intelligence better than by adopting this amendment and showing that it is sound on the saloon question as well as on the tariff and money questions.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I have heard no argument presented by the gentleman from New York in favor of his amendment that would in any way make up for the provision stricken from the bill. I sincerely hope the amendment will not be adopted; and now I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will not do that until we have a little more understanding of what this bill contemplates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BROSIUS. May we have the amendment again reported, Mr. Speaker?

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAY) there were—ayes 61, noes 60.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed by order of the House, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. PICKLER. I did not wish debate, but simply to ask a question.

Mr. WALSH. Would a motion to recommit be in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. WALSH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions to give persons interested in the matter in the District a hearing.

Mr. BABCOCK. I hope that motion will not carry. It seems hardly necessary.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the bill H. R. 148 will be laid on the table.

FALSE SWEARING, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That hereafter any trial board of the Metropolitan police force and of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall have power to issue subpœnas, attested in the name of the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to compel before it the attendance of witnesses upon any trial or proceedings authorized by the rules and regulations of the police force or of the fire department.

"SEC. 2. That any willful and corrupt false swearing on the part of any witness or person giving evidence before any trial board mentioned in the preceding section as to any material fact in any proceedings under the rules and regulations governing said police force and fire department shall be deemed perjury, and shall be punished in the manner prescribed by law for such offense.

"SEC. 3. That if any witness, having been first personally summoned, shall neglect or refuse to appear before any trial board mentioned in the first section of this act, then, on the fact being reported by the major and superintendent of police, or chief of the fire department, to one of the justices of the police court, it shall be the duty of that court to compel the attendance of such witness before such trial board in the same manner as witnesses are now compellable to appear before said court: Provided, That witnesses subpœnaed to appear before said trial boards, other than those employed by the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to the same fees as are now paid witnesses for attendance before the supreme court of the District of Columbia."

Mr. RICHARDSON. The object of this bill is simply to provide that the law now in force for the punishment of false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police shall be also extended to the fire department. It seems that in framing the original law this was left out, and that while provision was made for punishing false swearing before the police trial boards, false swearing before the trial boards of the fire department was not made punishable. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia ask this legislation, and I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

I ask to incorporate with my remarks a letter from the District Commissioners.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 14, 1896.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to recommend favorable action on H. R. bill 2654, to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892, which was referred to them, at your instance, for their views thereon.

The object of this proposed amendment is to make applicable for false swearing before trial boards of the fire department the penalities now prescribed for the like offense before police department trial boards.

The Commissioners would be much gratified if this amendment should be promptly enacted, as the legislation it contemplates is necessary to the maintenance of proper discipline in the fire department.

Very respectfully,
JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REASSESSMENT OF WATER-MAIN TAXES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, presents a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, in all cases where water-main taxes or assessments in the District of Columbia may hereafter be quashed, set aside, or declared void by the supreme court of the said District, by reason of an imperfect or erroneous description of the lot or parcel of ground against which the same shall have been levied, or by reason of such tax or assessment not having been authenticated by the proper officer, or by a defective return of service of notice, or for any technical reason other than the right of thepublic authorities to levy the tax or lay the main in respect of which the assessment was levied, to reassess the lot or parcel of ground mentioned in such defective assessment, with power to collect the same according to existing law relating to the collection of assessments and taxes: Provided, That where such assessments shall be so quashed or declared void by said supreme court for the reasons above stated the reassessment herein provided for shall be made within ninety days from the judgment or decree of the court quashing such assessment or declaring the same void: And provided further, That such reassessments shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date the original assessment should have been paid had it not been quashed or set aside.

The committee recommended an amendment to strike out the following:

And provided further, That such reassessments shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date the original assessment should have been paid had it not been quashed or set aside.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to obviate a difficulty that occurs in cases where taxes have been assessed and the assessment set aside by the supreme court of the District. This bill provides for a reassessment of those taxes, and in order to more clearly set the facts before the House I ask the Clerk to read the report.

The report (by Mr. HULICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, report as follows:

The object of this bill is to obviate objections that might be urged to the reassessment of taxes upon property which has changed hands after the assessment had been quashed by the courts and interests of innocent owners become involved. The equitable right of the District to reassess and collect taxes under such circumstances is unquestionable. Legislation of the character recommended is advisable not only for the purpose of enabling the District to recover revenue justly due it, but to save the District and owners of property assessed the trouble and expense incident to litigation to secure the removal of such assessments, as owners of property thus assessed would not be encouraged to resort to the courts for the vacation of taxes on grounds which would not prevent the authorities from reassessing them.

The committee, however, recommend an amendment of the bill by striking out all after the word "void," in the twenty-second line thereof, as follows:

"And provided further, That such reassessments shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date the original assessment should have been paid had it not been quashed or set aside."

The committee fail to see the equity in charging interest upon reassessments from the date of original assessment. If the officers who are charged with the duty of levying taxes fail for any reason to make a legal assessment, the fault or failure should not be charged up against the property owner. It is the duty of the officers to make legal assessments. It is the right and privilege of the taxpayer to resist the payment of an illegal assessment.

Your committee therefore unanimously recommend that the clause charging interest on reassessments be stricken out, and, when so amended, that the bill do pass.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what will be the practical effect if the judgment quashing the assessment has been announced more than ninety days before the passage of this act? Would that property go entirely clear? I refer to lines 17 to 21 on page 2, in which it is provided that—

Where such assessments shall be so quashed or declared void by said supreme court for the reasons above stated the reassessment herein provided for shall be made within ninety days from the judgment or decree of the court quashing such assessment or declaring the same void.

Mr. HULICK. The provision is that where such assessments shall be so quashed or declared void by the courts the reassessment shall be made within ninety days.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I know; but that does not answer my question. Will the property be exempt in cases where assessments have been declared invalid more than ninety days before the passage of this act?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We can scarcely deal with matters of that kind which are already past. We are dealing with the future. It is not intended to make the bill retroactive.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The first portion of the bill is retroactive.

Mr. HULICK. The object is to limit the time within which the reassessment shall be made. It shall not be left unlimited, and the committee thought that ninety days was a sufficient time for the making of these reassessments, so the property would not be subject to this reflection upon the title.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I agree entirely with the gentleman on that point, but my point is that if an original assessment was quashed more than ninety days before the passage of this law would not that property go entirely exempt?

Mr. HULICK. Why, certainly, and it would only have the same advantages that all property has had in the past. There has been an embarrassment following the assessment of property, where the officers have by fault or neglect in some way failed to make a legal assessment, for instance, by failure to give the proper description, or for any other technical reason, over which the owner of the property has no control, and for the failure of which the owner of the property should not be held responsible.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then it is not the purpose to go into prior assessments?

Mr. HULICK. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to call attention to the fact that the language in line 6 of the first section provides for assessments which may hereafter be quashed, and not prior assessments.

Mr. HULICK. It does not affect questions of illegal assessments that have already been passed upon and set aside by the court. It is only to afford protection against any complications in the future where assessments for any cause may be quashed.

The committee thought further in regard to the matter that interest should not be charged upon reassessments that have been caused by failure or neglect of the officers to make proper descriptions or legal assessments. We have therefore recommended the adoption of the amendment set forth in the report, striking out the provision for charging interest on reassessments. It is not equitable; it is not just.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MEDICAL COLLEGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, calls up a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any medical or dental college claiming the authority to confer, or actually conferring, the degree of doctor of medicine, or doctor of dental surgery, not incorporated by a special act of Congress, to conduct its business in the District of Columbia unless such college shall be registered by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and granted by them a written permit to commence or continue business in said District in compliance with the requirements of this act.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the proper officers of any such college, before commencing or continuing business, to apply to the said Commissioners for registration and a permit to commence or continue business; and said Commissioners are hereby authorized and required to make such regulations concerning the form of such application, the evidence to be adduced in support thereof, and the method of taking such evidence as they may deem best, and shall have power, and it shall be their duty, to give public notice of all hearings upon such applications; and no registration and permit shall be granted until after the Commissioners shall have, by the inquiry and hearing hereinbefore provided for and such other inquiry as they may see fit to make, satisfied themselves that all such medical or dental colleges are fully equipped, both by the character and fitness of the faculty and the sufficiency of their appliances, to give suitable and sufficient instruction in the theory and practice of medicine or dental surgery.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the proper officers of every medical or dental college not incorporated by a special act of Congress which is now doing business in said District to apply for such certificate and registration within thirty days of the passage of this act; and no such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District shall commence business without first obtaining such registration and permit.

SEC. 4. That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District, which shall continue or commence to offer instruction without first obtaining registration and permit, as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court of said District, upon an information similar to that filed in the case of violations of the police regulations made by the said Commissioners, shall be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned in the common jail of said District not less than thirty nor more than ninety days, said fines when collected to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That in any case when such action shall be necessary in the opinion of the said Commissioners to give full effect to the intent of this act they shall have power, and it shall be their duty, to file in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in the name of the said District, a bill in equity against the proper parties praying an injunction against the opening or continuance of any such college not registered and granted a permit as aforesaid; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such court to hear and determine such causes.

SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts and all charters heretofore obtained by any medical or dental college under the general incorporation laws in force in said District, so far as inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL].

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the chairman of this committee if this bill is in substance and spirit the same as the laws of our States generally which prevent or might prevent improper persons from practicing medicine or dentistry?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that this is not a bill regulating the practice of medicine and surgery, but it is for the incorporation of medical colleges—a general incorporation law.

Mr. HALL. I did not hear the reading of the bill, and I wish to know about that.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ODELL. I have the bill in charge.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman going to make a statement about it?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. ODELL. This bill, with one of a similar character now pending before Congress, has for its object the regulation of and also raising the standard of the medical fraternity in the District of Columbia. This bill under consideration is a substitute for the bill H. R. 2656. The difference between the original bill and the bill under consideration is that it includes the dental fraternity as well as the members of the medical profession. Under existing law medical colleges can be incorporated either through direct act of Congress or under a general law, and it is for the purpose of reaching the latter class that this bill is designed. It is in harmony with laws that are in force in the different States. It gives to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia supervisory power, so that they may be satisfied at all times that the colleges are institutions that should issue diplomas for the practice of medicine within the District of Columbia. Under the general law any number or variety of medical colleges may be organized without any supervisory power, after they have complied with the original requirements. This bill gives supervision to the District Commissioners, who are authorized at all times to supervise and regulate any medical college not incorporated under special act of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there are a number of colleges now in existence in the District of Columbia incorporated under general law?

Mr. ODELL. Only three.

Mr. CANNON. What are those?

Mr. ODELL. They are the National University, the National Homeopathic Medical Society, and the White Cross University of Science.

Mr. CANNON. Are there any dental colleges in the District incorporated under general law?

Mr. ODELL. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Well, why require these three colleges to appear before the District Commissioners before they can proceed with business? They are incorporated under the general law.

Mr. ODELL. Simply because, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, their diplomas are worthless in every State in the United States; and we thought that the health of the people of the District of Columbia was as worthy of consideration as the health of the people in New York or in Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Why are they worthless?

Mr. ODELL. Simply because they are not accepted as diplomas by the medical faculty in other States, and are thus discredited because they are not under the direction of a competent supervisory board.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask, for information, if these three institutions that are now in existence are not incorporated under the general law? As I understand, they are.

Mr. ODELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. CANNON. This morning when a special act was passed under the charge of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], giving a special charter to the National University, he stated, as I apprehended, that that was passed in view of an act that was to pass. Is this the one?

Mr. ODELL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. But this special act passed without knowledge, so far as I know, certainly without any upon my part, as to whether this institution that it is proposed to give a special charter to has equities or merits to take it out of the general law that it is now proposed to pass——

Mr. ODELL. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that I believe in the case he mentions the standard is all that could be desired, but it is also true that the standard of medical colleges in the District of Columbia has become a byword and reproach among the medical fraternity throughout the United States, and it is to prevent the incorporation of just such institutions in the future that we require that they shall have supervision, which will give them a standing and will give to the students who receive diplomas from such institutions the right to practice or to undergo examinations in any State in the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend think it wise to enact legislation the proposed enactment of which—the proposed enactment of which, before it is ever considered in the House—breeds a special act to give a special charter to a medical college that would otherwise come under its terms? Is not that pretty conclusive evidence of the unwisdom of this act?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will let me answer that. They do not object to the general law. The National University which was chartered this morning does not object to this amendment at all. They simply want it because they have been in operation for twenty years. As it now is any five gentlemen can associate themselves together and obtain a charter under the general law; and the idea was to make this law, which would operate to prevent institutions of that kind from doing business or carrying on their business without special permit of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the president, or the gentleman supposed to be the president, of one of these institutions named appeared before the committee and said that they neither had a building, faculty, nor students, and still they are an incorporated medical college of the District of Columbia, with the right to issue diplomas.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ODELL. I would like to qualify that statement so far as the National University is concerned. As I understand, that is a reputable college, but there are others here that are not in good standing. At the hearing before the District Committee evidence was given as to one of these institutions that the only students it had ever graduated were two, one of whom was president of the college. Now, the gentleman must concede that such an institution as that should not be allowed to exist.

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire that any bogus colleges shall exist, but it does strike me that if there be a reputable college, incorporated under a general law, having a building, professors, and appliances, and actually engaged in the business of turning out doctors with diplomas, it ought not to be necessary for an institution of that kind to come in and avoid the investigation before the District Commissioners that is here referred to.

Mr. ODELL. I think that this bill has the approbation of the medical fraternity of the District, and they generally regard it as for the good of the profession.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; all the physicians of the established schools of medicine favor it, and the District Commissioners approve it.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose there ought to be some safeguards thrown around the turning out of those who are to exercise the healing art, but there is great danger that those who claim that they are highly educated in that line and that other people are not may use this legislation as an engine of oppression. In the legal profession I have always believed that about as good a way as any was to let everybody practice law that thought he could get clients, because men are not apt to secure clients unless they demonstrate their competency; but it is possible that there ought to be some special safeguards thrown around the medical profession.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that in his own State the course required for admission to the medical profession has recently been changed, so that now a course of three years of eight or nine months in each year is required instead of a two years' course of five months in each year. That is the standard which now prevails in the State of Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but let me say to the gentleman in reply that I am satisfied that as a rule no one school of medicine could found a college easily if it had to pass under the fire and supervision of those attached to another school of medicine, because the manner in which we are to be taken off, or the manner in which our taking off is to be prevented, is a matter about which there is very great difference of opinion between the several schools. [Laughter.] I simply wanted to be certain before this bill passed that there was no danger of setting up a war between those who would cure us without medicine and those who would cure us with medicine, because I have never been quite sure myself which of the several schools of medicine was the best.

Mr. BABCOCK. This bill has the approbation of the leading doctors of the different schools in this District.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know the object of section 4 of this bill. Is it to prevent the enlightenment of mankind, to prevent the spread of education and intelligence?

Mr. ODELL. No; it is to carry out the provisions of the bill as enumerated in the preceding sections, and to provide a proper penalty.

Mr. RAY. But is not section 4 entirely unnecessary in order to carry out the provisions in the preceding part of the bill? Section 4, as I read it, plainly provides that it shall be unlawful for persons being the officers or belonging to the faculty of any medical or dental college now in existence in this District to teach medicine, or to teach anything else, to give instruction of any kind in any branch of learning without first having obtained a license as provided in this bill.

Mr. ODELL. That applies to any medical or dental college not incorporated by general act of Congress.

Mr. RAY. But what good reason is there why the members of the faculty of these colleges should not go on instructing people in medical or dental science? Why make it a crime for them to give instruction? You have already by this bill prohibited them or the college to which they belong from granting diplomas.

Mr. ODELL. But suppose they do grant diplomas, what then? That is the case provided for in section 4, and is, I submit, a just and proper restraint.

Mr. RAY. But you have provided in other sections of the bill, under penalty, that they shall not grant diplomas. Under section 4 you provide—

> That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District, which shall continue or commence to offer instruction without first obtaining registration and permit, as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court of said District, upon an information similar to that filed in case of violations of the police regulations made by the said Commissioners, shall be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars, and in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned in the common jail of said District not less than thirty nor more than ninety days.

That is what you do. You first make it a criminal offense for these duly incorporated institutions, or for the officers or faculty of these institutions as such, to give instruction in medical or dental science, or in anything else, and grant diplomas without a license. Now, what objection can you have to these people, as plain individuals, giving instruction in dental science, for example?

Mr. ODELL. If these colleges are up to the standard and will obey the provisions of the law, they will have no trouble. The law provides how they may get permits.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; if any such college chooses to go and get registration and a permit the penalties will not apply.

Mr. RAY. Suppose the Commissioners of the District will not grant a permit?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then they ought not to have it.

Mr. RAY. Why not? Suppose a duly incorporated college of medicine or of dentistry in the State of New York, or the State of Maine, or Massachusetts—an institution up to the standard of the State to which it belongs—should locate here——

Mr. RICHARDSON. In that case there would not be any trouble.

Mr. RAY. Or should come here and simply propose to give instruction in medical or dental science. What objection could there be to that? They would not grant diplomas.

Mr. ODELL. The objection is that while one good college might come here half a dozen poor ones might also come, and those half a dozen poor ones might do more harm than the other institution, which is up to the standard, could do good. We propose to treat them all alike. They must come in and take their chances.

Mr. HULICK. The inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], as I understand, is this: If a medical institution of New York or of Ohio, or some other State—an institution recognized by the laws of those States—should come here to instruct in medical science, why should they not be permitted to do so? Certainly they should be if these instructors are well qualified, are recognized by the laws of their respective States as qualified to give instruction, and are licensed by their State, because all of the States and Territories, I believe—at least 43—require such licenses.

Mr. BABCOCK. Forty-seven.

Mr. HULICK. Yes; 47 of them require licenses of this kind. Now, if any reputable medical or dental association or college should come into this District and hold themselves out to the world to give instruction, why should they not be required to go to the District Commissioners and obtain a permit to do so?

If only reputable and legitimate institutions should come here from the various States to give instruction, then there might not be any necessity for such a measure as this. But what would the gentleman from New York think if a man calling himself "a university" should appear here and acknowledge that his institution embraced merely himself as president and one other man as the faculty—suppose such a "university," without standing, without character, should hold itself out to the world as competent to teach medical science in this District, and should invite medical students to come and be taught, would not the gentleman think we ought to protect the citizens of this District against such an institution, existing as a "university" only upon paper? Now, a fact of just that kind was brought to the attention of the committee. Therefore it is quite evident that persons representing such institutions which may undertake to give medical instruction in this District should be required to go to the Commissioners for a license before being allowed to proclaim to the world that they are prepared to educate students in medical science. It seems to me there can be no objection to such a requirement.

Mr. RAY. Perhaps there is not; but it struck me as a novel proposition to make it a crime, as one section of this bill proposes to do, for the officers or faculty of a medical or dental college as individuals to simply teach medicine in the District of Columbia without a permit.

Mr. HULICK. The offense aimed at is teaching as a medical college or university, teaching in that capacity; and it ought to be declared a crime by Congress for one or two or any number of men to come here and publish to the world that they have a university or a college and are qualified and authorized to teach medical science, when in fact they could not obtain recognition anywhere, in any State, if their true character were known.

Mr. BABCOCK. It would necessarily follow, if they were allowed to teach, that they would issue diplomas.

Mr. RAY. Not at all; because your bill prohibits that, and I have no objection to the prohibition.

Mr. HULICK. Let me say that there is nothing in this bill which would prohibit one man or a dozen men, or more, to come into this District and teach medical science as individuals; but they ought not to be permitted to come here and call themselves a medical university or college, and offer to give instruction as such in medical science. Whether a corporate body or not, they should be prohibited from publishing themselves in the newspapers as authorized to give instruction. Such advertisements can be seen now in almost every issue of our daily papers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And they undertake to confer degrees.

Mr. HULICK. Certainly; they claim to teach medical science, to issue diplomas, confer degrees, and, as the main object in view, to get money out of the people.

Mr. PAYNE. They "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in." [Laughter.]

Mr. HULICK. Well, I will not say they will "steal the livery of heaven"——

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the livery of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HULICK. But they come here to obtain money from citizens of the District without giving a proper return therefor. The object of the bill, it seems to me, is very commendable.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman from New York will listen a moment, I think I can make this matter clear. The first section of the bill, to which I call his attention, provides that—

It shall be unlawful for any medical or dental college claiming the authority to confer, or actually conferring, the degree of doctor of medicine, or doctor of dental surgery, not incorporated by a special act of Congress, to conduct its business in the District of Columbia, unless such college shall be registered by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and granted by them a written permit to commence or continue business in said District in compliance with the requirements of this act.

Now take the fourth section in connection with that——

Mr. RAY. Let me ask the gentleman whether the whole proposition is not covered by section 1?

Mr. BABCOCK. I hope the gentleman will wait a moment. I want to call his attention to the language of section 4:

That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said district—

This does not refer to a single man or a body of individuals who may undertake to give instruction without claiming to be the officers or faculty of a college or university—which shall continue or commence to offer instruction without first obtaining registration and permit, as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the police court of said District, upon an information similar to that filed in the case of violations of the police regulations made by the said Commissioners, shall be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars, etc.

If these two sections be read in connection with each other it will be found that the prohibition and the punishment apply directly to the officers and faculty "of any such medical or dental college"—not to individuals as such.

Mr. RAY. I have read the two sections; and the reading of them has suggested my criticism. Section 1 prohibits the college or society, or whatever you may call it, from carrying on its business here at all as a college or society. That applies to the association, and of course prohibits all of the officers of the society or incorporation, whichever you may call it, from carrying on the business of the incorporation or society by whatever name you may call it; and that covers the whole subject. Now, you are not satisfied with that; you are not satisfied with what you have done. You are not satisfied with driving the association out of business, and with outlawing the college, but you go further and attempt to strike down the officers of the faculty as individuals. Having prohibited the college from doing anything, you also outlaw and proceed to attack the officers as individuals, telling them if they have the impertinence to undertake to teach medicine or dentistry or anything of that kind in the District of Columbia they shall be felons, criminals, subject to fine and punishment under the provisions of this act. You prevent their giving private lessons.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a lawyer who has studied this bill who will not say at the first glance that that is the effect of it—first to strike down the college or society, whatever it may be, and having done that, in the second place to prevent any of the officers connected with it from teaching medicine or dentistry again in the District of Columbia as individuals.

Mr. ODELL. Oh, no, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RAY. No, I am not; that is the logical and legal construction of the bill.

Mr. HULICK. Why, if the gentleman will allow me, I will call his attention to section 4, and if the gentleman will examine that section he will hardly make the contention he does. It says:

SEC. 4. That such of the officers and of the faculty of any such medical or dental college now in existence, and of every such college hereafter sought to be opened in said District, which shall continue or commence to offer instruction without first obtaining registration and permit, as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Now, unless you reach the individuals who undertake to form a corporate body for this purpose you can not punish the corporation, which lawyers know have no souls, and sometimes no bodies.

Mr. RAY. I deny the proposition that lawyers have no souls.

Mr. HULICK. I was talking about corporations having no souls.

Mr. RAY. I agree that corporations are usually soulless. But every lawyer knows that when you have prohibited an association, corporation, or society from doing a thing you have prohibited every officer of that corporation from doing the act prohibited in the name of the corporation, and if he attempts to do the prohibited act in the name of the corporation or as a corporation, he becomes liable to whatever penalties may be affixed. Therefore you have prohibited all you seek to prohibit by section 1.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. How would you punish the officers or agents of an association of any kind which was prohibited by law from doing an act, unless you acted with reference to them as though they were individuals?

Mr. RAY. But you have provided by section 1 that the penalties for violating section 1 shall not only be imposed on the society or college, but on each individual officer of it.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York, with his consent. Suppose in line 4 of section 4, after the word "instruction," you insert the words "in such capacity." Would that not obviate the difficulty the gentleman suggests?

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not know that I have any objection particularly to the bill as it stands. Only it seems to me, as I have said, that it undertakes to go even further than the committee desires to go. The amendment suggested will obviate the trouble, I think.

Mr. McCULLOCH. That insertion would make them liable, not as individuals teaching, but as individual professors undertaking to teach in violation of this law.

Mr. RAY. It seemed to me to be rather drastic legislation to prohibit a college of this character from teaching, and then turn round and strike at the officers of the faculty as individuals.

Mr. ODELL. I disagree with the gentleman from New York, if he will pardon me for the interruption. I think the proper interpretation is that the punishment would only operate when the officers and faculty continue to act as such, and violate the law.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 4, line 4, after the word "instruction" by inserting "in such capacity."

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ODELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. W. H. CRAIN, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

In pursuance of the foregoing resolution, the Vice-President appointed as said committee Mr. MILLS, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. KYLE.

When, as an additional mark of respect, the Senate adjourned.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 43) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds, bulbs, etc., as has been done in preceding years; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and resolutions of the following titles:

On February 11, 1896:

An act (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals, and to provide penalties therefor, in the Territories and District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, now in the Department of Justice; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents.

JOHN L. WALLER.

The Speaker laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 28, 1895, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence and other papers in regard to the case of John L. Waller, a citizen of the United States, at present in the custody of the French Government.

It will be seen upon examination, as would of course be expected, that there is a slight conflict of evidence upon some of the features of Mr. Waller's case. Nevertheless, upon a fair and just consideration of all the facts and circumstances as presented, and especially in view of Mr. Waller's own letters, the conclusions set forth in the report of the Secretary of State do not appear to admit of any reasonable doubt, nor to leave open to the Executive any other course of action than that adopted and acted upon as therein stated.

It is expected that Mr. Waller's release from imprisonment will be immediately forthcoming.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 11, 1896.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 28 last, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the public interests, copies of all correspondence relating to affairs in Cuba since February last."

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of State and such portions of the correspondence requested as I deem it not inconsistent with the public interests to communicate.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 11, 1896.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be, and is hereby, created a board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia, which shall consist of the presidents of the three boards of medical examiners hereinafter provided for and two persons, not physicians, to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, each for a period of three years, or until his successor is appointed: Provided, That not more than two members of the board of supervisors shall be adherents of any one system of medical practice: And provided further, That said Commissioners may remove any member of said board for neglect of duty or other just cause, and that in case of the death, resignation, or removal of any member the vacancy for the unexpired term of said member shall be filled in the same manner as other appointments are made.

SEC. 2. That the said board of medical supervisors shall elect a president, a vice-president, and a secretary. Said board shall make, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, such regulations as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act. Said board shall hold such meetings as may be necessary for the transaction of business. Said board shall supervise all examinations provided for in this act, and shall issue all licenses to practice medicine and surgery or midwifery in the District of Columbia. Said board shall keep an official record of its meetings, also an official register of all applicants for examination for licenses to practice medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia. Said register shall show the name, age, and place and duration of residence of each candidate, the time he or she has spent in medical study, in or out of medical schools, and the names and locations of all medical schools which have granted said applicant any degree or certificate of attendance upon lectures in medicine. Said register shall also show whether said applicant was rejected or licensed under this act. Said register shall be prima facie evidence of all matters contained therein. The secretary aforesaid may be elected by said board from others than its own members; said secretary shall also act as treasurer, and shall give such bond as may be required by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; said secretary shall have the power to administer oaths upon such matters as pertain to the business of said board; said secretary shall mail to the address of each applicant a notice of the time and place of examination, not less than seven days before the examination, and at a longer period if requested by the applicant at the time of making application.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act all persons desiring to practice medicine and surgery in any of their branches in the District of Columbia shall apply to said board of medical supervisors for a license to do so. Applicants shall submit to examination upon the following-named branches, to wit: Anatomy, physiology, chemistry, pathology, materia medica and therapeutics, hygiene, histology, practice of medicine, surgery, obstetrics and gynecology, diseases of the eye and the ear, medical jurisprudence, and such other branches as said board shall deem advisable. Each applicant shall be certified by said board for examination as speedily as possible to the board of medical examiners whose members are adherents to the system of medicine which said applicant desires to practice; but said board shall not certify for examination any applicant until satisfactory proof is furnished that he is of good moral character and over 21 years of age, nor until he has presented a diploma conferring upon him the degree of doctor of medicine, issued by some medical college authorized by law to confer such degree: Provided, That said diploma, if issued prior to July 1, 1898, shall be accompanied by satisfactory evidence that said applicant has studied medicine and surgery for not less than three years prior to the issue thereof, and if issued subsequent to June 30, 1898, shall be accompanied by satisfactory evidence that the applicant has studied medicine and surgery for not less than four years prior to the issue of said diploma. All examinations shall be both theoretical and practical and of sufficient severity, to test a candidate's fitness to practice medicine and surgery.

SEC. 4. That said application for a license to practice medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia shall be made to the secretary of said board of medical supervisors upon a form prescribed by said board, and shall be accompanied by a fee of $20. Each application shall be in the hands of said secretary not less than two weeks before the day set for examination, and any application may be rejected for refusal to furnish any of the information called for, or for other irregularity. All applications shall be kept on file by said secretary.

SEC. 5. That immediately after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall appoint three boards of medical examiners, one to be known as the board of medical examiners of the District of Columbia, and to be composed of five physicians in good standing, adherents to the regular system of medical practice; one to be known as the board of homeopathic medical examiners of the District of Columbia, and to be composed of five physicians in good standing, adherents to the homeopathic system of medical practice, to be selected from a list of not less than ten names, submitted by a majority vote at some regular meeting of the Washington Homeopathic Medical Society; and one to be known as the board of eclectic medical examiners of the District of Columbia, to be composed of five physicians in good standing, adherents to the eclectic system of medical practice, to be selected from a list of not less than ten names, submitted by a majority vote at some regular meeting of the Eclectic Medical Society of the District of Columbia. Of the members of each board first appointed one shall be appointed to serve one year, two to serve two years, and two to serve three years, and thereafter each member of each board shall be appointed to serve three years, or until his successor is appointed: Provided, That no member of said boards shall have engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia for less than five years at the time of his appointment: And provided further, That in event of the failure of the Washington Homeopathic Medical Society or of the Eclectic Medical Society of the District of Columbia, after fifteen days' notice by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to submit the list of names aforesaid, said Commissioners may appoint the members of the board of homeopathic medical examiners or of the board of eclectic medical examiners, or of both, as the case may be, without restriction as to nomination by the society or societies in default; And provided further, That said Commissioners may at any time remove any member of said boards for neglect of duty or other just cause, and that in case of the death, resignation, or removal of any member the vacancy for the unexpired term of said member shall be filled in the same manner as other appointments are made.

SEC. 6. That each member of said boards of medical examiners of the District of Columbia shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, take an oath to administer fairly and impartially the provisions of this act. Each board shall elect from its own members a president and a secretary. Each board shall hold a meeting for examination in the city of Washington on the second Thursday in January, April, July, and October of each year, and continuing so long as may be necessary to examine all applicants, and at such other times as the board of medical supervisors shall direct. Each of said boards of medical examiners shall examine, at the examination immediately following the receipt of the proper certificates from the board of medical supervisors, all applicants for licenses to practice medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia so certified.

SEC. 7. That the several boards of medical examiners shall, not less than one week prior to each examination, submit to the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia questions for thorough examinations in anatomy, physiology, chemistry, pathology, materia medica and therapeutics, hygiene, histology, practice of medicine, surgery, obstetrics, and gynecology, diseases of the eye and the ear, medical jurisprudence, and such other branches as said board of medical supervisors may direct. From the lists of questions so submitted said board of medical supervisors shall select the questions for each examination, and such questions shall be the same for all candidates, except that in the department of therapeutics, practice of medicine, and materia medica the questions shall be in harmony with the system of medicine selected by the candidate. Said examinations shall be conducted orally and in writing, in accordance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the board of medical supervisors, and shall embrace the subjects as stated in section 3 of this act. An official report of the result of each examination, signed by the president, and the secretary and each acting member of the board of medical examiners conducting such examination, stating the examination average of each candidate in each branch, the general average, and the result of the examination, whether successful or unsuccessful, shall be transmitted to the board of medical supervisors within fifteen days from the date of such examination. Said report shall embrace all the examination papers, questions, and answers thereto. All such examination papers shall be kept for reference and inspection for a period of not less than five years.

SEC. 8. That if in the opinion of a majority of the board of medical supervisors, after a careful examination of the report of the board of medical examiners by which any applicant was examined, said applicant has fairly and successfully passed such examination as hereinbefore provided for, the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia shall, as soon thereafter as possible, issue to him a license signed by the president and the secretary of said board and attested by the seal of the District of Columbia, which license shall entitle said applicant, after it is registered as hereinafter provided, to practice medicine and surgery in the District of Columbia: Provided, That a license shall be issued upon application, free of cost and without examination, to each physician, a graduate of any medical college in good standing, who is registered at the health office of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act: And provided further, That a license may be issued, under such regulations as the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia, with the approval of the Board of Commissioners of said District, shall make, to any physician holding a license from any State board of medical examiners established by law which has required, before the issue of said license, qualifications and examinations equivalent to those required by this act for the issue of similar licenses. All licenses issued by said board shall be numbered consecutively, and a register shall be kept by the secretary showing the number of each license, the date of issue, and to whom issued.

SEC. 9. That the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia shall make, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of said District, such regulations as may be necessary to determine the qualifications of women desiring hereafter to commence the practice of midwifery in the District of Columbia, and shall issue licenses to such as are, after examination, found qualified; but no fee shall be charged for the examination of any applicant for such licenses, and no applicant who has been rejected shall be reexamined within one year from such rejection: Provided, That a license shall be issued upon application, free of cost and without examination, to each midwife registered at the health office of the District of Columbia at the time of the passage of this act.

SEC. 10. That the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia may, by a vote of four members, refuse to grant or may revoke a license, and may cause the name of any person to be removed from the record of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and from the register of the health office for any of the following causes, to wit: The employment of fraud or deception in passing the examinations provided for in this act, chronic and persistent inebriety, the practice of criminal abortion, conviction of crime involving moral turpitude, or publicly professing, in such a manner as to deceive the public, to cure or treat diseases, injury, or deformity. In complaints under this section the accused shall be furnished with a copy of the complaint and given a hearing before said board in person or by attorney, and witnesses may be heard for and on behalf of the accused, and for and on behalf of the said board. Appeal from the decision of said board may be taken to the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and its decision shall be final. Said board may at any time within two years from the refusal or revocation of a license, or the cancellation of registration under this section, by a vote of four members, issue, without examination, a new license to the person so affected, restoring to him all the rights and privileges of which he or she had been deprived by said board.

SEC. 11. That any person receiving a license as hereinbefore provided shall have it recorded in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia within three months from the date of said license, and the place and date of record shall be certified thereon by said clerk; and the holder of the license shall pay to the recording clerk a fee of 50 cents for making the record. The holder of said license shall, after the same has been recorded, exhibit the same at the health office, and register, in a book provided for that purpose, his or her name and address. Whenever a license is revoked by said board of medical supervisors the secretary thereof shall report that fact in writing to the clerk of said court and to the health officer of the District of Columbia, who shall thereupon cancel such registration.

SEC. 12. That this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine-Hospital Service, nor to regularly licensed physicians and surgeons in actual consultation from other States or Territories, nor to regularly licensed physicians and surgeons actually called from other States or Territories to attend specified cases in the District of Columbia, nor to the treatment of any case of actual emergency, nor to the use of ordinary domestic remedies without any fee, gift, or consideration of any kind being given in return therefor.

SEC. 13. That from and after the passage of this act any person practicing medicine and surgery or midwifery in the District of Columbia, or who shall publicly profess to do so, without first having obtained from the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia a license to do so and registered the same, as herein provided, or in violation of any of the provisions of this act or any of the rules and regulations made by authority conferred herein, or after his license or registration, or both, has been canceled by order of said board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not less than fifty nor more than five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the District jail for a period of not less than ten nor more than ninety days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. It shall be the duty of the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia to prosecute all violations of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. That the secretary of the board of medical supervisors shall be paid for taking testimony the same fee that is allowed to an examiner in chancery for the same service. The expense of said board and of the examinations shall be paid from the license fees herein provided for; and if any surplus remain on the thirtieth day of June of each year the members of the board of medical supervisors appointed as such shall be paid such reasonable compensation as said board may determine, and any balance then remaining shall be divided among the three boards of medical examiners in proportion to the number of candidates examined, each member of each board of medical examiners to receive such part of the entire amount paid as that board itself shall determine.

SEC. 15. That nothing in this act shall be construed to conflict with an act for the regulation of the practice of dentistry in the District of Columbia, approved June 6, 1892, nor to interfere with graduates of standard dental colleges, registered under the provisions of said act, in the exercise of their profession to the extent and within the limits of the curriculum of such standard dental colleges.

SEC. 16. That all acts or parts of acts, general or special, now existing not in accordance with the provisions of this act, or inconsistent therewith, be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill as reported by the committee is the result of more than twenty years of attempted legislation in the District of Columbia. It has been carefully prepared. The laws of 47 States and Territories have been presented for the use of the committee, for comparison with this measure, and for the first time in many years the different medical societies have reached an agreement as to the necessity for the passage of the bill.

There is only one State in the entire Union, outside of the District of Columbia, which has not a law regulating the practice of medicine and surgery. That is the State of New Hampshire. This District is the only other place in the country where the practice of medicine and surgery is not regulated. The effect of the laws in other States is to drive out irregular practitioners, and many come here to locate and practice in the District who would not be tolerated in Virginia, Maryland, and other States.

The bills that have been before Congress heretofore have been antagonized by various wings of the medical societies. Objections have been raised to different provisions, so that no agreement has heretofore been reached. This bill has been carefully considered, not only by the medical societies, not only by gentlemen representing the different schools of the profession, but carefully, section by section and line by line, by the committee, and the committee are unanimous in the opinion that a measure of this kind is absolutely necessary for the protection of the people in the District of Columbia. For that reason they have made a unanimous recommendation, and ask for its favorable consideration by this House.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if I understood him to say that all of the medical societies of the District have agreed to this bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand that the two leading societies, the allopathic and the homeopathic, have agreed as a unit to the bill, and that there has been only a partial agreement reached by the eclectics.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill is not a discrimination against all who practice medicine and the art of healing outside of the methods employed by the three old schools—the allopathic, the homeopathic, and the eclectic?

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no; any person who can pass an examination before any of these three boards can practice. I will read the latter part of the report:

> It permits the candidate to be examined, of his own choice, in that system of medical practice in which he has been educated, and having demonstrated the sufficiency of his education, it permits him to pursue absolutely any system which he may desire, whether among those named in this bill or not.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, there is a tendency upon the part of some practitioners of medicine in this country to assume that they are possessed of all of the knowledge there is to be had relative to the art of healing, and there have been efforts made along certain lines to secure to certain practitioners a monopoly of the right to heal ailing humanity. I want to say that while I am not a physician, nor the son of a physician, and do not pretend to know anything about the art of healing as a practitioner, I do know that that art is not an exact science. I know that the practice of medicine is not an exact science, and that all of the knowledge in regard to healing the ills of humanity is not possessed by any individual or medical fraternity. I object to any proposition that tends to monopolize the art of healing and give it into the hands of a select few who assume to know all there is to be known in regard to this matter, and who, to a certain extent, have become egotists and say, "Our way is not only the best way, but the only way, and if you want to practice the art of healing you must come to us and receive our consent before you can do it."

I have not examined this bill thoroughly enough to know positively that it does this, but I am afraid that it tends to do this, and I submit to this House that if it does it ought to be defeated, because we can not afford to do a thing like that. I wish now to submit and have read from the Clerk's desk a protest against this bill from the Eclectic Medical Society of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. May I ask the gentleman what the Eclectic Society of the District of Columbia is? What does it embrace?

Mr. KEM. It is a school of medicine peculiar to itself. I am not able to say just what it is.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Does it embrace all physicians who are not of the homeopathic or allopathic schools?

Mr. KEM. I think not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Hair doctors, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. KEM. It does not.

Mr. HARDY. Faith doctors and cranks?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Faith doctors, hair doctors, and corn doctors?

Mr. KEM. It does not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Has it any theory of medicine?

Mr. KEM. It has.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. What is it?

Mr. KEM. I do not know. Mr. Speaker, I will simply ask the gentleman what that has to do with this question?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You presented a protest.

Mr. KEM. I do not pretend to know all the different theories of medicine. I am not a physician. I have stated that I am not; but I do lay down the principle that no man on earth, of any school of medicine, knows all there is of the art of healing.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will answer the gentleman's question, if I may be allowed to. You present a protest signed by the Eclectic School of Medicine. I am not thoroughly informed as to all the schools of medicine, and I simply asked the gentleman what it is. I never saw an eclectic doctor in my life, although I have read the signs and the advertisements of a great many different kinds of doctors. I simply want to know if that includes all persons practicing medicine who are not doctors.

Mr. KEM. I do not pretend to know, as I have said, anything about this question. I am not a physician; but I do know enough about it to say that it does not embrace all the classes of healers that he has referred to. I ask that the protest be read.

Mr. STEELE. Is this body to be composed entirely of allopathic physicians?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There can not be more than two of any particular school of medicine on the board.

Mr. KEM. I ask for the reading of the protest.

Mr. STEELE. Do you say that this will not include the eclectic school?

Mr. BABCOCK. There are three boards.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). It can be read as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. KEM. I ask to have it read as a part of my remarks.

The protest was read, as follows:

Objections of the Eclectic Medical Society of the District of Columbia to Senate bill No. 325 and House bill No. 2652, "To regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia."

SECRETARY'S OFFICE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Eclectic Medical Society begs to present to you its objections to Senate bill No. 325 and House bill No. 2652, "To regulate the practice of medicine," etc. These two bills are identically the same and are placed in both Houses simultaneously, under different numbers.

As the above bill is of vital importance to the people of the District of Columbia and their physicians, it being the object of its projectors to secure the exclusive monopoly of the practice of medicine, and every other curative means, to the three schools of physicians mentioned in the bill, and as we are included and made party to the scheme without our knowledge or consent as a society or individuals, we have taken the liberty of drawing your attention to these facts. As the projectors of the bill are in special haste to "railroad" the bill through Congress, and as the committees for the District of Columbia of both Houses are already overcrowded with work, we fear they will not have time to critically weigh the import of the bill and discover the intent of its several sections. As the time given for the hearing in the Senate subcommittee was less than two hours, and that in the House committee only one hour to hear all arguments pro and con, our representative had to retire with the major part of our objections unheard. We therefore beg to present our objections in condensed form for your critical and joint consideration.

First. We object to the false statement in the preamble of the bill, because there is a law to regulate the practice of medicine in the District of Columbia, which is just to physicians and humane to the people, and which amply protects the profession and the public from impostors, by fines and imprisonment.

We therefore protest and declare that there is no necessity for the passage of this bill. You will find the present law in volume 6, United States Statutes at Large, page 741.

Second. We object to section 5 of the bill, giving the Commissioners of the District of Columbia power to select the members of the three boards of medical examiners, because we consider that the three medical societies (under the present law), being composed of educated physicians, are much better qualified for that purpose than the said Commissioners. We object to the partial method of selection of said boards (lines 4 to 19), and also to five years' qualification for members of said boards (lines 24 to 27), as it may unnecessarily disqualify several able physicians from membership.

Third. We object to section 1, because it creates a board of medical supervisors, composed of three physicians, and two persons holding office under the Government of the United States, or the District of Columbia, thus giving the Commissioners an opportunity to select two-fifths of the board from uneducated and unsuitable persons. As the said board of supervisors is to supervise all examinations (section 2, lines 7 and 8) and to direct the boards of medical examiners (section 7, lines 8 and 9) and to select the subjects and branches on which candidates are to be examined, it is of the utmost importance that such a selected board should be composed of persons beyond suspicion as to educational qualifications and fitness for this censorship. We also think that the said board being composed of five members, it will prevent an equal representation of the three schools named in the bill. We protest that the said board of medical examiners would be an unnecessary and an expensive element in the examination of candidates for license.

Fourth. We object to section 4 (lines 4 and 5), authorizing the charge of $20 for examination, as it would be a burden and a bar to poor candidates. We also call your attention to section 15 (lines 4 to 15), setting forth the manner in which said fees are to be appropriated by said supervisors for their services. We think that such a method would be unfair and unjust to the members of the boards of examiners who bear the burden of the work of examining.

Fifth. We object to section 8 (lines 12 to 24), because it discriminates against and will debar from practice all physicians now lawfully registered and practicing in the District of Columbia, who are not graduates of colleges, that are at present in so-called "good standing." As there are only a few colleges which at present follow the curriculum prescribed in this bill (and we believe that prior to ten years ago there were no colleges nor State boards of medical examiners who had adopted the said curriculum), it is only reasonable to conclude that a large majority of those now lawfully practicing in the District of Columbia could not successfully pass such an examination. Therefore it is unjust to demand an examination from one class of physicians and exempt the other.

Sixth. We object to section 10, because it converts the board of supervisors into a court, with power to try any physician, without judge or jury, for the crime of advertising, etc. (the other crimes would come under our criminal code), and to inflict such punishments as would professionally and financially ruin their victim. The same section converts the Commissioners of the District of Columbia into a court of appeals, whose decisions shall be final. It also endows said Commissioners with the right to issue a license to practice medicine to those who have been refused a license or who have had their licenses revoked by the boards of examiners and supervisors; thus empowering them to license persons to practice medicine who, from lack of education or moral character, may be totally unfit to practice medicine.

Seventh. We object to sections 13 and 14, because they make it a crime for any physician who has had the degrees of M. D. or M. B. conferred upon him or her by any college or university to append the same to their names in the District of Columbia unless they shall first obtain a license to do so from the Commissioners or the board of medical supervisors.

Eighth. We object because it also deprives all physicians other than those of the three schools named in the bill from practicing their chosen lines of therapeutics. This prohibition is not simply confined to the use of drug medicines (see section 13, lines 4 and 5), but "any drug or medicine or other agency" for the treatment or cure of disease. This will stop from practice all botanic, hydropathic, bio-chemic, Turkish-bath, massage, vitopathic, magnetic, and Christian science specialists. These schools or sects in medicine have each their well-defined theories and arts in the science of therapeutics, and have an equal right to serve the people who may desire their services as those of the allopathic, homeopathic, and eclectic schools.

We therefore pray that you in your wisdom may deem it proper to use your power to lay aside and refuse to pass this bill and all future bills of like character.

We are, very respectfully,

THE ECLECTIC MEDICAL SOCIETY.
GEO. MACDONALD, M. D., Secretary.

Hon. O. M. KEM, M. C.

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to call attention to a matter that has been read there. I desire to say that the section referred to there as objectionable, section 13, has been stricken entirely from the bill and it is not reported to the House.

Mr. KEM. If I heard right, when the bill was read section 13 practically contained the objection to which reference is made.

I will state that I am not here in the interest of any medical society. I am not here in the interest of any particular theory in the art of healing; but I am here in the interest of the whole people, because I believe that this bill seeks to monopolize, as I have said, the art of healing. As the gentleman acknowledged here, there are but two of the medical societies of this District who have agreed to this bill. It is practically their bill. It is not the first effort, Mr. Speaker, that they have made to monopolize the art of healing, as is well known by the older members of this body. They have been at it ever since I have been a member of the House, and they have sought in various ways to get bills of this nature passed, giving them a monopoly of the art of healing.

Mr. HARDY. Healing is not an art, but a science.

Mr. KEM. If this bill becomes law, it will prohibit, absolutely prohibit, the advancement of medical science and the art of healing except along certain lines laid down by the allopathic and homeopathic schools. For this reason I must object as strenuously as I know how to the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I now understand the bill is open for amendment, I desire to amend this bill. I do not think that the gentleman in charge of the bill will object.

Mr. STEELE. Permit me to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I want to ask the chairman of the committee——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me get this amendment before the House and then I will give way. I wish to move that the bill be amended in section 3, line 16, page 4, by inserting after the word "he" the words "or she."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask to amend by inserting in line 16, section 3, page 4, after the word "he" the words "or she"; and in line 17 of the same page, after the word "he," add the words "or she." I will send the amendments to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer an amendment after that is disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let this be disposed of.

Mr. BABCOCK. We accept that.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 16, after the word "he" add the words "or she"; in line 17, same page, after the word "he" add the words "or she."

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This gives females the same rights and privileges that it gives males.

Mr. DANFORD. Under the same restrictions as males?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. DANFORD. I was about to offer an amendment of that character.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if the particular objection made to this bill by the eclectic and homeopathic physicians has been stricken out?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to offer another amendment; after the word "him," in line 18, add the words "or her." As I understand, the gentleman in charge of the bill accepts the amendment, and without objection it is agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the additional amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 18, after the word "him," add the words "or her."

Mr. HULL. Is it not the construction of all statutes that the word "he" includes both sexes, and is not this proposed amendment a mistake?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not think it is.

Mr. HULL. I think it is.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this matter was brought up in committee and the opinion of the attorneys there was that the present wording of the bill included both sexes, and that is why the committee did not report this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, the amendment puts it beyond question, and to remove any possible doubt I think we ought to have this amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether the principal objections made to it by the eclectic and the homeopathic physicians have not now been stricken out?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; it was the thirteenth section of the original bill that was objected to, so the committee struck out that section entirely and have submitted here a new bill, the original thirteenth section being omitted.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment, to which I think there would be no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 13 by adding the following:
"Provided, That this act shall not apply to massage, the Swedish movement, and other similar methods of treatment without medicine."

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer two amendments, which I will read:

Amend by striking out in section 3, page 4, of the bill, beginning with the word "nor," in line 17, down to and including the word "evidence," in line 25.
Also amend by striking out of line 27, on the same page, the language beginning with the words "prior to," down to and including the word "diploma."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk now read the language proposed to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will report the provision as it will stand if amended as proposed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each applicant shall be certified by said board for examination as speedily as possible to the board of medical examiners whose members are adherents to the system of medicine which said applicant desires to practice; but said board shall not certify for examination any applicant until satisfactory proof is furnished that he is of good moral character and over 21 years of age; that the applicant has studied medicine and surgery for not less than four years. All examinations shall be both theoretical and practical and of sufficient severity to test a candidate's fitness to practice medicine and surgery.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk has just read that part of the section as it will stand if my amendment prevails, and I think it ought to prevail. I am quite in accord with the idea of requiring people who exercise the healing art to be competent to exercise it; but God made the people, and some people learn outside of medical or law colleges. This bill absolutely requires that before anybody shall be examined as to his fitness to practice medicine, even though he may have attended a medical college for a considerable period, he must produce a diploma from such college. Now, that is not necessary. All the diplomas on earth do not make a man competent to practice medicine or to practice law; and if a man has a knowledge of the healing art within the language of this bill and can stand the examination that this section, as I propose to have it amended, will make it necessary for him to meet, he is competent to practice medicine, as competent as many that may have dwelt in a medical college. In other words, I propose to strike out this restriction and let every man stand upon his own merits, upon his knowledge of medicine and surgery all along the line, and if he fills the bill, and takes the examination successfully, I say he ought not to be deprived of the privilege of practicing medicine. In other words, let us make this a bill which seeks to test the fitness of a man to practice medicine without necessarily burdening the applicant.

I offer this amendment for the reason that within my own knowledge, extending over thirty to forty years, some of the most eminent physicians and surgeons that I have been acquainted with (and I have been acquainted with a good many) were men who never had a diploma from any medical college. I have in mind some who had received some degree of training in medical colleges, but time and money had not been forthcoming to enable them to continue and get their diplomas. On the other hand, I have known some of the best physicians who never were inside of a medical college. What I propose is that each tub shall stand on its own bottom, and that, however a man may part his hair, or whatever may be the shape of his feet, or wherever he may have been educated or not educated, if he can fill the bill and stand the examination herein provided for, I would let him exercise his profession.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is adopted, it will be the adoption of an entirely new rule, a new departure in regard to practitioners in medicine. As I stated before, 47 States and Territories have enacted laws governing admission to practice medicine and surgery, and in not a single State or Territory out of the whole 47 is a physician allowed to practice without having first obtained a diploma from a medical college. Now, should we here in the District of Columbia, the last jurisdiction, with the exception of one State, to pass a medical law—should we here exempt persons desiring to practice medicine from the obligation of obtaining the necessary preliminary qualification of a medical education? I think not, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is a very serious mistake to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman has not observed the scope of my amendment. Let me read the section as it will be if the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BABCOCK. I believe I understand it.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I want the House to understand the effect of the amendment. This section, if the amendment be adopted, will read:

That from and after the passage of this act all persons desiring to practice medicine and surgery in any of their branches in the District of Columbia shall apply to said board of medical supervisors for a license to do so. Applicants shall submit to examination upon the following-named branches, to wit: Anatomy, physiology, chemistry, pathology, materia medica and therapeutics, hygiene, histology, practice of medicine, surgery, obstetrics and gynecology, diseases of the eye and the ear, medical jurisprudence, and such other branches as said board shall deem advisable. Each applicant shall be certified by said board for examination as speedily as possible to the board of medical examiners whose members are adherents to the system of medicine which said applicant desires to practice; but said board shall not certify for examination any applicant until satisfactory proof is furnished that he is of good moral character and over 21 years of age; that the applicant has studied medicine and surgery for not less than four years; all examinations to be both theoretical and practical, and of sufficient severity to test the candidate's fitness to practice medicine or surgery.

Under my amendment, a man, in order to be allowed to practice medicine, must pass the prescribed examination; but under the section as reported by the committee he must have a certificate of graduation from some medical college. The latter requirement I propose to strike out.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] draws a very clean line; it easily determines the issue between him and the gentlemen who support this bill. According to the gentleman's amendment it is not necessary that a man studying medicine should ever enter a medical college at all——

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. He may read medicine in the office of his father, who may be one of the medical advisers, or supervisors, or inspectors, and thus, by virtue of favoritism, he may become a full-fledged doctor when he is not qualified at all. This bill proposes to throw around the medical profession a strict line of qualification. If the practitioner of any profession in the world ought to be qualified, ought to be drilled, educated, and schooled, and have all the advantages that a collegiate course of study, together with observation and practice, can give him, it is the practitioner of the medical profession.

I know that there are throughout the country, as well as in this District, people who pretend to cure by laying on of hands—people who profess to cure by prayer and by faith. There are "hair doctors," and all kinds of so-called "doctors." But when I declare my judgment against such practitioners as humbugs and frauds I believe I pronounce the verdict of the sensible people of this country everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, this bill as reported is the unanimous judgment of the allopathic and the homeopathic doctors. I have always been associated with both classes of doctors, and this is the first time within my knowledge that these two classes of practitioners have ever agreed upon anything. When you get the allopathic or "old-school" doctors of the city of Washington and the homeopathic doctors to unite upon any measure pertaining to medicine and surgery that measure must be pretty nearly right. Therefore I for one am ready to vote for this bill as reported by the committee.

I can see no purpose to be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois except possibly to let into the practice of medicine somebody who has not passed the proper tests. I believe that all the tests mentioned in this bill should be complied with. Not only should the medical student study medicine and study it diligently, but he should pass through some college created and recognized by the law. He should have a diploma. This bill requiring not only a course of medical study, but a diploma, does not, in my judgment, require too much. Indeed, I think that still other restrictions, reasonable in their character, might be added. The fact that lawyers are admitted after sufficient reading of law without passing through a law college has nothing to do with this case. Lawyers deal with the property of individuals, preachers deal with their souls, but doctors deal with their bodies, and they should be held to the strictest test of all.

CHAPLAINS AT WEST POINT ACADEMY.

Mr. HULL. I desire to submit a conference report and ask its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). That is in order.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309 of the Revised Statutes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 4.

J. A. T. HULL,
GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
J. P. TRACEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOS. R. HAWLEY,
WM. J. SEWELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

Statement to accompany conference report on H. R. 4145, relating to chaplaincy at West Point Military Academy:

The House agrees to Senate amendment numbered 1, striking out the words "from civil life," so that the chaplain can be appointed either from chaplains now in the Army or from civil life.

The House also agrees to Senate amendment numbered 2, striking out the words "Secretary of War" and giving the President the power to appoint the chaplain.

The House also agrees to Senate amendment numbered 4, which amends the title of the bill.

The Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 3, leaving the pay of the chaplain the same as agreed to by the House, that of a captain, mounted.

J. A. T. HULL.
J. P. TRACEY.
GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

The report was adopted.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLARDY], who is a member of the medical profession.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words in reference to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. If that amendment had been proposed fifty years ago there would have been some little reason for its adoption; but I do not think there is any reason why it should be adopted now. This is a day of great improvements in medicine, as in many other branches of science and study. In fact a doctor who undertakes to treat the physical frame of man in disease must know it in health; and while it may be true that some physicians in our country have become eminent in their profession without going through the curriculum of a medical school, such practitioners are at this time exceedingly few.

It is now a rare thing for a young man to undertake to practice medicine unless he has gone through a course of study at a regular medical school. Nor, Mr. Speaker, is it necessary that he should. The facilities now for learning, the colleges, are so many, they are so convenient to all of our people, that there is absolutely no possible excuse for any man going before the people and offering to take charge of their bodies in illness or disease when he has not subjected himself to the ordeal that his science and the proper practice of his profession demands.

There is no excuse for not attending the colleges. Such excuses as that might have applied years ago, but they have no force now. It is impossible for a man to become efficient in the practice of medicine, and especially in the practice of surgery, without attending these schools. It is impossible for a man in private life to obtain such facilities, such practical examples in his profession as he can acquire by the teachings of his school. He must study, for instance, anatomy; he must be familiar with physiology, and he must understand both of these to be able to examine into diseases and their nature. In order to understand his profession he must be familiar with anatomy, and this is particularly the case in regard to surgery, to enable him to understand what operations he may perform in treating the diseases of the men, women, and children that he may be called upon to attend. It is a matter of very great importance when we come to put our lives and our health in the hands of our physician. You want at least, under such circumstances, a reasonable assurance that he has passed through that experimental knowledge which will enable him to attend to the cases with some degree of success. In order to accomplish this he must have gone through a college where there are facilities for making post-mortem examinations, which would be impossible for a man who undertook to study in private life.

For these reasons I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. I do not think that the restrictions imposed by the bill are too arduous or stringent for any man in this age and generation to submit to; and that unless men will submit themselves to the time and care in pursuing proper studies in the medical colleges, where facilities for studying are at hand, they ought not to be allowed to take the lives of our people in their hands. They should be restricted, at all events, unless they had been through this curriculum and had prepared themselves to do the life work of their profession.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], who was inclined to make merry over this suggestion of mine, that I did not refer to "hair doctors" and "corn doctors" or to any other doctors of that class. I have never employed in my life any hair doctor or corn doctor, and I do not think I ever shall, but if I should desire to, I do not want to be prohibited by law.

But I wish to say that we have the evidence before us, in my opinion here, that an attempt is made to hand over into the keeping of these two schools of medicine, the allopathic and the homeopathic, the lives and the health of the American people despite the fact that under the jurisdiction and control of these two schools—if I may be allowed that term—for years and years past every graveyard in this country has been filled to overflowing, and we have not the living, but abundance of dead, examples of their skill in treating the diseases of mankind and their inability to cope successfully with the ills that flesh is heir to. I submit, sir, in view of this silent but potent evidence, that it ill becomes any man or any committee on this floor to stand here and seek to hand over into the keeping of these schools the lives and happiness of the people of this country.

It is evident to all that the science of healing—the science of medicine—is not an exact science; and it is also evident that there is a great field yet to be explored along the line that these men never thought of; and what I wish to protest against in this connection is the shutting of the door to the appeal of men prompt and quick to take advantage of every improvement for the purpose of investigating further the condition of diseases, and saying to them, "No; if you want to learn how to heal mankind you must go along the old lines, the old traveled path laid down by us for you. You may not enter into new fields from which you might learn something new; you shall not enter any other territory, for we are possessed of all knowledge of the facts, and are pursuing the only true course, which you must pursue or else you can not come at all."

I want to say in this connection that this intolerance is along the same line of religious intolerance, the intolerance of the theologian, who lays down a certain method by which you must save your soul, by which you can only be saved, and unless you follow the strict line they lay down you are in danger of eternal damnation. Theological egotists and medical egotists lay down a line upon which every investigator must pursue his investigation, notwithstanding the fact that upon the other side of that line the secret of a successful treatment of diseases of mankind may be found ready to be picked up by the intelligent man who will take advantage of his opportunity of investigation regardless of theories or isms. But you dare not pick it up, for they say, "Oh, no, that is not according to our school," and consequently you must let it alone; it can not be true.

Let me say in conclusion that despite the slurs the gentleman from Pennsylvania sought to put upon every word said, outside of these schools, some of the greatest cures that mankind has ever been blessed with have been the result of a treatment wherein no drop of medicine was used, external or internal.

A MEMBER. Then it must have been a faith cure. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEM. No, it was not faith cure, either; and I want to protest against any proposition that seeks to restrict this investigation or hold it down to any particular lines. I want to say in my opinion the world, yea, the universe, is the field of investigation, and is still full of beneficial remedies and methods that will bless mankind if the investigators of our country and of the world who delve down deep into the secrets of nature from various standpoints are allowed to avail themselves of the facilities of nature for the betterment of mankind, and you should not impose upon them the arbitrary restrictions of certain egotistical men who assume that they are possessed of the only true means to benefit mankind.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the pending amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, can we have the amendment reported before the vote is taken?

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 17, beginning with the word "nor," strike out the following: "Nor until he has presented a diploma conferring upon him the degree of doctor of medicine, issued by some medical college authorized by law to confer such degree: Provided, That said diploma, if issued prior to July 1, 1898, shall be accompanied by satisfactory evidence."

Also, in line 27, strike out the words "prior to the issue of said diploma."

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will turn to page 10, line 10, I should like to call attention to the following provision, to see what it means, so as to ascertain whether I shall want to offer an amendment. I refer to the words beginning in line 10, "or publicly professing, in such a manner as to deceive the public, to cure or treat diseases, injury, or deformity."

I wish to ask whether that would prohibit such advertising, by a skilled physician, who has passed this examination, as is usually prohibited by the "ethics of the profession," so called?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; I understand not. The very language itself says, "or publicly professing in such a manner as to deceive the public."

Mr. CANNON. Who is to pass on that?

Mr. BABCOCK. The court.

Mr. CANNON. My friend knows, by reputation, Dr. Flower, who, I believe, has his headquarters in Boston, and Dr. Saulsbury, whose headquarters, I believe, are in New York. There are various others like unto them, skilled physicians, or at least having that reputation. I am under the impression that they advertise largely all over the United States and have many thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of patients, and there are many thousands of people who believe they receive great benefit from their treatment. I am not here to criticise anybody, but the regular profession speak of all people who advertise as "blessed quacks," or the opposite word to blessed. Now, suppose they come down to the District of Columbia and pass this examination, and go to advertising in the Post; take a whole sheet and fill it up with statements of cures that have been made and what they are competent to do? That, of course, would cut them out of the medical societies. Would that enable the Commissioners, under this law, to take from them their license?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, it would not.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If you strike out the words "or treat," in line 11, so that the section will read, "or publicly professing, in such a manner as to deceive the public, to cure diseases," would not that remove your objections?

Mr. CANNON. It may be wise to strike out the words "or treat"; but I am merely challenging and inquiring, because we ought to be careful about legislating so as to clothe any regular society with the power to wipe out somebody who does not happen to belong to that society. That is all I want to say, and I have great sympathy with regular societies, as far as that is concerned; but the rights of the citizen, after all, ought to be protected.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have simply suggested an amendment which it seems to me would remove the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois. By striking out the words "or treat," in line 11, I think the difficulty will be obviated. It might be that if a man advertised to treat diseases his advertisement might be worded in such a way that some people would think he intended to deceive the public.

Mr. McCULLOCH. He ought not to be allowed to deceive the public as to treatment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If you strike out the words "or treat," a man's certificate could not be taken away from him for advertising treatment.

Mr. CANNON. Let the gentleman offer his amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 11, after the word "cure," strike out the words "or treat."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me say first that I think a man who advertises to guarantee a cure—that he can cure a disease—possibly ought to have his certificate taken from him; but a man who undertakes to treat a disease ought not to be treated so harshly.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Although he does it to deceive?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. He can treat it at least.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has announced that he is in sympathy with the friends of this measure, and I know he is; and I am glad to have his intelligent cooperation; yet I think he attempts to make a distinction here that does not exist. He said a quack may come here and advertise that he is going to treat a certain disease, but he can not advertise that he is going to cure it. Now, I think there is just as much harm in giving him permission to advertise that he is going to treat such a disease as that he should advertise that he is going to cure it. It seems to me the distinction is utterly without a difference.

Mr. KEM. I would like to have the gentleman define a "quack."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Here in section 10 of the bill you have a provision that does not propose a penalty at all, but states the circumstances under which you can take a diploma away from a person who has been granted it. Now, here is the provision:

That the board of medical supervisors of the District of Columbia may, by a vote of four members, refuse to grant or may revoke a license, and may cause the name of any person to be removed from the record of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and from the register of the health office for any of the following causes, to wit.

And it enumerates them. Now, here is power lodged in four members, the board of supervisors.

Mr. McCULLOCH. With an appeal allowed to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And there is an appeal allowed to the District Commissioners.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I catch the gentleman's point, and I will answer it. I think that the gentleman's objection will not be obviated by the gentleman's motion, because he wants to provide here that the party coming here may advertise to treat these diseases, but can not advertise to cure them. Now, if you accept the language of this amendment, you would permit these outside persons to come here as he has designated them and proceed in such a manner as to deceive the public by advertising they would treat diseases, but not to cure them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The gentleman will pardon me. You are misstating the proposition. One part of this bill provides that no man can practice medicine without he has a diploma. This simply provides the conditions of things which authorizes the board to take away the diploma. It does not authorize anybody to treat disease, but provides power to take away the diploma. Now, your criticism is not tenable, it seems to me; but an amendment such as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois has some force in it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Pending the count,

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE said: I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KEM. I renew it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is renewed.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 21, noes 42.

Mr. KEM. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska makes the point that no quorum is present. [After a count.] One hundred and eighty-two; a quorum is present. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia a question; and I first desire to inquire under what regulations or laws are physicians now practicing in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BABCOCK. Practically none.

Mr. DINGLEY. Practically none.

Mr. BABCOCK. These societies can license anybody.

Mr. DINGLEY. But there are those who are practicing medicine, and they are now authorized to so practice under existing law.

Mr. BABCOCK. Under a license from the society to which they belong.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, having ascertained that, I want to ask you if those physicians who are practicing medicine in the District of Columbia to-day under existing law have to conform to these requirements before they can enter upon the further practice?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Are they recognized and licensed without having to pass an examination and obtain a diploma provided for by this act?

Mr. BABCOCK. Those who are now practicing under the law are recognized by this act and are not required to take the examination.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then this only applies to the future.

Mr. BABCOCK. This only applies to the future.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move to reconsider.

Mr. KEM. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I make the point of order that it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it.

Mr. KEM. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. No such fact has been developed by a division or in any way. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, that is all the business the Committee on the District of Columbia have to offer to-day.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia announces that that committee has no other business to present at this time, and, under the special order adopted, the House, in Committee of the Whole, will resume consideration of the pending financial bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will please resume the chair as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] for ten minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the question now being discussed by the House of Representatives is a dead issue. Its death knell was sounded at noon on February 5, when in response to a call for bids for one hundred millions of coin bonds forty-seven hundred persons from all over the land put in their answer, aggregating six times the amount required. No man upon this floor, no person in these United States, believes for a single moment that this would have been the case if in the judgment of this nation free coinage of silver was a possibility. Then why should Republicans discuss the question longer? Why waste the time of this House in trying to fit to a live Republicanism the last year's cast-off garments of a discredited Democracy.

A giant cracking nuts with a certainty that the meats within were withered and shrunken and all the sweetness gone would to me be no more absurd. This is a question for Democrats to settle, and by their actions on this floor and in the other House they are already weary of it, and are gladly thrusting it upon their opponents to breed dissension in our ranks. To exploit economic theories, to pay debts on the Christian science principle of believing that none exist, or by the exercise of faith to claim that 50 cents will cancel the honest obligation of a dollar, to run a government upon deficiencies and bond the seigniorage of a revenue tariff—these are the methods of Democratic statesmen. Why should Republicans try to emulate them?

We are within a year of Republican control of this great nation, great because for thirty years it was Republican, and great enough to survive, though grievously hurt, four years of Democratic blundering.

Free coinage of silver will not be an issue in this fall's campaign, except in the national convention of the Democratic party, and there it will be crushed to death in one more dying struggle for spoils and place.

This nation will not be treated to the spectacle of Southern statesmen exchanging power for principle, however dear it may seem to them. Already the shifting process has begun. The old speeches addressed to "my fellow-citizens" instead of the members of this House are being delivered over again and the permission to print is fully improved by padding the RECORD with the relics of a past campaign.

In the other House the tariff measure, patriotically framed to meet the daily expenses of the nation, is throttled by the Democratic garrote of another free-coinage bill, a running mate to this one upon which we are wasting time, and by more than two to one the Democratic members here will put themselves on record for a principle (or lack of it) which will be ignored or overridden when Grover Cleveland writes the platform for the July convention, and then they will all "line up" to push the fight for spoils as in the brave old days of yore. Think for a single moment what this renewal of a hopeless attempt to enact a free-coinage law has already cost this country.

If the overwhelming voice of the American people a year ago meant anything it was that protection should be the policy of this nation. Two months ago their representatives assembled here to enact that declaration into law. In disappointment with the result of his own party policy, with the Treasury sinking every day deeper and deeper into debt, the President frantically called on Congress for help and succor. Within four days this House passed a tariff bill to cover the deficiency in the revenue, and then provided for the maintenance of the gold reserve; but in doing that added to the bond bill a specific clause which practically compelled an increase of the customs duties by forbidding that the proceeds of the bonds should be used for current expenses. Then our friends upon the other side, knowing full well that the bill would pass this House, stood up side by side, gold-standard and silver men alike, and by a truly bimetallic vote made plain and clear the strength of their convictions now.

The failure of this bill, defeated in the Senate by those who might have saved it, and saved it, too, with no sacrifice of principle or personal honor, has already added fifteen millions to the interest debt of the United States and put Executive approval of the tariff act beyond the range of probability; for, with two hundred and eighty-one millions of cash at his disposal now for current expenses, why should he, with his peculiar views, permit the tariff bill to become a law when it shall have passed the Senate?

The substance of relief by a tariff act has been exchanged for the dim shadow of free coinage, and, as in the old fable told so many times, the result is nothing.

The living issues that Republicans must stand upon if we would win this fall and enter upon our inheritance are these:

First. Revenue, laid upon protection lines, to fully meet expenses and reduce the debt to some extent and develop the resources of the nation. Yes, more than that, to provide for the gradual extinguishment of the five hundred millions of promised principal and interest which this three years of misrule has cost the people—almost half a million dollars a day.

Second. We must present a sound system of national finance and give the business interests of the country peace.

Third. We must maintain the honor and protect the rights of the American people everywhere, abroad as well as at home, and give sympathy, encouragement, and hope to men who are fighting for freedom in other lands.

Fourth. We must remove the depression due to Democratic fogs and storms by bringing in the sunlight of confidence and consequent prosperity; and if we do these things, as I believe we can, our time will be fully occupied without a resurrection from the dead past of an experiment with coinage laws which have been repealed by every thriving, prosperous nation on the globe. [Applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to occupy the attention of the committee on this question, but the discussion has assumed some phases in consequence of which I think it proper to submit a few remarks. When the bond bill passed this House some people, maybe, supposed it passed because there was an imperative necessity for some such legislation. Since that time bids have been received and accepted for $100,000,000 of bonds; American labor has a new mortgage of $100,000,000 upon it, so that the supposed emergency—I never believed that any existed—so that the supposed emergency, if any did exist, has passed.

The bill went to the Senate, and was there amended so as to provide not for an issue of bonds, but for the coinage of silver, the utilization of what silver we have and the opening of our mints for the coinage of both the precious metals. In this condition of things, with the emergency, if any existed, past, with the need for such legislation, if there ever was any need, past, we still find the majority party in this House insisting upon this bond legislation. It is not for me to lecture this majority party, but I call attention to the fact that that party assumed to be in favor of this legislation solely because from its point of view and that of the President there seemed to be a special necessity for it.

Now, confessedly, that necessity, if it ever existed, has passed. Yet we find that party insisting upon its pseudo emergency legislation instead of accepting that which is proposed in the Senate substitute, legislation which looks to the future, looks to a permanent provision not only for emergencies such as that which was supposed to exist recently, but for the needs of all time, upon lines long tried and well proved by trial to be safe. It will hardly do to say to the country that the dominant party here is in favor of bimetallism and yet rejects bimetallism in favor of a permanent policy of issuing bonds. Nor will it do to say to the country that this Republican party, with its exceedingly large majority here, is unable, so far as this House is concerned, to do precisely what that party is in favor of doing.

The country will certainly understand—there can be no misunderstanding about it—that whatever is done by this House with referencee to this bill is what the Republican party in this House deliberately, not under the spur of some overpowering necessity, but deliberately, as a matter of judgment and conviction, desires to do with reference to the great questions involved in the bill before us and in the substitute for that bill. It ought not to be prejudicial to the party that while it has a great duty thrust upon it it has at the same time the great opportunity of speaking, and the full power to speak, in such a manner as that its voice may be clearly heard and its meaning clearly understood by the whole country.

Whatever you do, gentlemen, with reference to this bill will be taken, must be taken, as your deliberate judgment upon the great question of what should be done in financial legislation, and as a foretaste of what you will do if the people entrust you with a larger measure of power for a longer extent of time.

I was somewhat startled the other day, Mr. Chairman, to hear my colleague [Mr. HALL] declare in his speech in this House that he had heard from an official high in the Treasury Department that probably within the coming twelve months there would be issued United States bonds amounting to a thousand millions of dollars. A thousand millions of dollars in bonds! A billion dollars of debt to be fastened upon the people of this country in a single peaceful year! Why, and for what? I am not disposed to treat this merely as the vapid declamation of a sensationalist, because I have observed that as gentlemen change their views upon this money question, and as they get closer to the views that prevail at the Treasury Department and further from the views that prevail among their constituents, they become daily better authorities upon what is intended and what is likely to happen about the Treasury Department. [Laughter.]

Contemplate the picture! In time of profound peace, with no necessity resting upon us, with a country rich in all the resources with which any people ever were blessed, we are threatened with an issue of a thousand million dollars of bonds in a single year to carry out a particular Treasury policy; to force upon the people, willingly or unwillingly, a policy which has no hearty support in their ranks; a policy which could not be upheld if submitted to the people in any quarter of the Union, not even excepting the Northeast; a policy which is almost entirely without support in the South and the West.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague suggested some other things to which it seems to me, as a Missourian, I ought to give at least passing attention. I have nothing to say about my colleague's conversion. A man's conversion and changes of opinion are matters resting with himself. I do say, however, that the people whom he represents and the people whom I represent, the people of the great State of Missouri, are not lacking in courage, judgment, or honesty, nor is it required that politicians shall go abroad among them to tell them what is right and what is wrong, what is good and what is bad. They are a brave people; they admire courage. They are an honest people; they esteem honesty. They are a consistent people; they have respect for consistency. These people know some things and will continue to know some things, even if the politicians do not venture among them upon the broad, and philanthropic and courageous mission which my colleague would suggest.

Perhaps the crying sin of the day is that the politicians do not rise to the summit of courage to which this gentleman has mounted, and tell the people wherein they are in error, as he says. Perhaps that is true. But it has sometimes seemed to me that graver harm comes from the fact that some politicians, appearing before the people as the advocates of certain doctrines, obtaining the suffrages of the people upon certain pledges—after they are clothed with power by the people; after they are commissioned by the people to carry out the people's will, fall away from their professions, forget their teachings, turn their backs upon those who have given them honor and power, and join with those who are opposed to their constituents. [Applause.]

I say again that I have sometimes fancied the people suffer more from misrepresentation than they do from the lack of courage in those who essay to teach them what is right and what is wrong, what is wise and what is unwise.

I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that distinguished men have changed their opinions. We have them among us. They are to be found everywhere. It is a common enough thing for people, great and small, to change their views. It is common enough for people, good and bad, to change their views, and change their course of conduct. But I think the conclusion is not an irresistible one that when a man changes his views and course upon some great question, he is large beyond the measure of ordinary men, or good beyond the goodness of ordinary men. That conclusion is not necessarily one which we must adopt, because history and observation do not coerce us into it.

I make no invidious comparisons or suggestions about these things; I merely think changes may be upward or downward. I know that some men stand conspicuous in history for having changed their course, and changed their professions, when the change, according to the judgment of mankind, has not been in the right direction. I know that through twenty centuries and by sixty generations of men the memory of Judas Iscariot and of the great betrayal has been kept alive, that upon it might be heaped, in perpetual freshness, the execrations of mankind. I know that Benedict Arnold, who shed his blood in the cause of freedom and afterwards turned against his country, is remembered as a frightful example, and, thank God, one of the few examples, held up for the condemnation and the execration of universal manhood and patriotism.

I know, too, that there are people who remain steadfast in views which they have formed upon deliberation and study, views which they believe to be correct, and which have been tested and tried, who can not well be rated as Chinese or as resembling the ignorant class in the East Indies or like unto some dark and benighted tribe in the depths of African jungles; much less may they be classed as belonging to the lower animals.

I do not attribute to my colleague any suggestion that he was sent here by representatives of any of those classes. I know that the men who sent him here, the men before whom he appeared as an advocate in season and out of season of the free coinage of silver, are as honest and as sincere as can be found anywhere in this Union.

I myself, like all men I suppose, have some admiration for courage. I can admire the man who, clinging to his own opinion, though it be newly acquired, is willing on account of it to surrender place and power, is willing to retire from the walks of public life to the shades of private life. And I can also imagine a case where perhaps the shades of private life may soon rest upon one without particular reference to his course upon this question or that question. There are such cases. When those cases arise, in those particular instances—I am not citing any at all—in those particular instances it may be seen that the surrender of great and good things is rather before the footlights and for the galleries than the actual giving up of anything which may be retained. [Applause.]

Now, I do not know what persons were referred to in my transformed colleague's allusions to the "feathering of nests." I know, Mr. Chairman, or I believe I know, that the person who obtains the suffrages of the free born citizens of Missouri by advocating doctrines to which they are devoted, and who then changes his views so as to turn himself against that which he advocated before them, and which they wished to have advocated and voted here, is liable to find no finer lining for his nest than the rough straw, unless some great duck-shooter shall drop a little down into that nest. [Laughter and applause.]

I wish to say—and I call upon gentlemen who doubt the correctness of the saying to note the event for the proof—I wish to say that when the Democrats of Missouri are heard, as they will be upon the 15th of next April, when their representatives meet to send delegates to the national convention, they will speak with no uncertain voice. I believe they will not speak in the apologetic tone of those who have been left to grope in darkness because of the cowardice of politicians who have failed to instruct them. I believe they will not speak in the voice of the courageous politicians, like my colleague, who are assuming to instruct them against their deliberate judgment, but I do believe that when the voice of Missouri is heard it will be heard again, as it has been heard heretofore, in favor of what the Missouri Democrats understand to be the doctrine of justice and right, the doctrine of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the old time-honored, time-tried, and time-tested ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. Chairman, the question before us is really a very serious one. It is of vast moment. It is a question, I believe, which will be discussed in the next few months from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf; a question upon which millions of men will vote in next November. Shall we shrink from it? Shall we dodge it? Shall we endeavor to evade it by subterfuge? Let us realize ourselves that the people of this country have begun to learn without the intervention of political teachers that he that is not with us is against us.

Now, my colleague gave some more very startling information to the House. I understood him to state that as many as eight Senators who voted for the free-silver amendment now before us said they believed that its passage was fraught with grave danger and serious harm to the country—I do not recollect the exact words he used, but that is the thought. As to this statement I know nothing. But the question was asked, Did he believe it? He replied that he did. The question, "Do you believe the charge?" was, perhaps, the precise one asked.

I think it likely that the word "charge" must have virtually been put into the mouth of my colleague, and that he did not utter it himself. Certainly "charge" is not the word that he would choose, for, unless he has been greatly misrepresented, for a number of months in last year my colleague was going through the State of Missouri discussing the question of finance and of his own enlightenment and endeavoring to enlighten the benighted people according to my colleague's ideas, newly developed. He is reported to have said that he had learned the error of his way and had become satisfied that the sound-money theory as interpreted by JOHN SHERMAN and Secretary Carlisle was the salvation of the country, and that he could no longer subscribe to the silver heresy, but, having been elected by a free-silver constituency, upon a free-silver platform, he would vote for the heresy.

I did not hear him say it. I do not know that he did say it. But I know that it was reported from all over my State that he did say so, that that declaration was made by him, and never did I hear a contradiction of the general report. Then may I not conclude that although the gentleman has, or may have, the information that he says he has concerning the declarations of the eight Senators which he seems to regard as so indefensible, he has no "charge" to make against them? Because, if it be true that they voted for the bill believing it to be wrong, and that following in the track of its passage would come the injury they are reported as saying would come, why should he make a "charge" against them when they were but doing what the gentleman, as reported, had a habit of saying he would do himself?

Yes, the people of Missouri are sturdy, honest, brave, deserving people. They are in favor of what they are in favor of, at home or away from home. At home and away from home, they are opposed to what they are opposed to. The man who faithfully represents that people has no special mission to instruct them, because they are not so densely ignorant. He should keep faith with them, speak with their voice, as he contracted with them to do when he obtained the commission which he still continues to hold for what it is worth to him.

If my colleague would go back to that magnificent Second district of Missouri which sent him here to represent it, and say, "Such a change has taken place in my judgment on this money question that I may no longer honestly vote for what I said I believed and advocated, and of course I can not misrepresent you by taking the other side; I return you the commission which you intrusted to me"—if he were to do that and go back to that splendid constituency in his new rôle as an instructor and advocate of that which all his life long, until the shadow of the Treasury fell over him, he condemned, he would hardly be his own successor to fill the vacancy caused by his own resignation. [Applause.]

These Missouri people have not changed, and so in resignation might be found some sublimity of courage; courage which parts with something, and not that courage which seems to part with something that is going anyhow. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing I might mention. In appearing before his constituents, especially if he has that lofty code for his own guidance which makes him the exemplar and teacher of his people, he should be exceedingly careful always not to ask credit of them or to take credit from them beyond his real deserts. For instance, if I were to go before the people whom I represent and claim that I was the author of the income-tax law, we will say, that I was the man to whom credit ought to be given for it, and if they should conclude that I was right about it, that I was talking according to the record, they would give me credit to which I am not entitled. I simply was one of hundreds in favor of that measure.

The income tax was not discovered lately. It was not invented recently. The ancients knew about it. It was in the law of our own country years ago.

So, likewise, if my colleague from Missouri were to pose, or were to allow himself to be posed, as the author of the income-tax law, knowing that he is not, he would be taking or receiving credit where it is not due. If he were to appear before his people as the midwife present when the income-tax law was born, as the wet nurse that cared for it in the hours of its puling infancy, as the godmother at its christening, as the steadfast guardian and protector of it in all the years that followed, and if the people were to give him credit accordingly he would get credit beyond his deserts. Because, like the rest of us, all except the gentleman who really drafted that income-tax provison of the tariff bill, he simply supported it, he simply advocated it as he advocated free silver coinage, and voted for one measure as for the other.

All these things, and a great many more, suggest themselves to our minds if we will allow ourselves to stop and reflect a moment. And all these things suggest to us, too, that perhaps we may make a mistake if we assume to be so much better than the people; that perhaps we may drop into error if we assume that we have acquired much wisdom that the people who chose us do not possess, and, in the pride of an empty self-sufficiency, take a course contrary to that which they directed us to take.

Speaking of the income tax, I might say further that perhaps as long as judicial history shall last, as long as men shall read of the decisions of courts and of those who made them, only one little thing connected with that income-tax law and with its overthrow will drift down the current of time and carry the memory of at least one man to the far-distant future, to be queried about and commented upon when the names of greater and better men shall have long since sunk beneath the floods of oblivion.

That law, Mr. Chairman, was to compel wealth to bear its share of taxation and to give to poverty a measure of relief from unjust burdens. That law had behind it the wish, the prayer, and the hope of millions of struggling men and women in this land. It had against it the concentrated power of wealth. It had for it when it was first passed upon by the highest court in the land one in particular of those who occupy seats upon that exalted bench. It had against it a few weeks later upon the same question, when the vote was decisive, the same person.

We all ought to be charitable in this matter, I think, of judging people on account of a change of opinion. I have cited some instances from history—some remote, some recent—to show, so far as one can show in this casual way, that merely because a man has changed in opinion or in conduct, merely because he faces in a different direction, we ought not, if the matter is of much consequence, to conclude out of hand, right away, and of course, that he has risen above the level of ordinary mortals, when, perchance, he may have dropped below that common level upon which so many men pass through this life.

I recur to the original proposition, having been somewhat discursive in my remarks. Mr. Chairman, what will your party do with the question now before us? Can the party so handle this matter as to stand in the East for the single gold standard and in the West and South for that much abused and little understood thing, bimetallism? I hardly think so. The party can declare now where it stands. The Republican party can vote for something and against something. Nothing but itself can prevent it from doing it. It has absolute power here. I think, though I am not the adviser of the party, I am not assuming this role of instructor—my colleague may do that—I say it seems to me that your party has a duty to discharge to itself and to the country. I know that in the West and the South there are thousands of men within the ranks of the Republican party who are in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon the ratio of 16 to 1. What will you give them?

I know, too, that in the same sections of the country the dominant element, the larger part, of the Democratic party is sincerely devoted to the same doctrine. Shall they be overborne again by the Northeast? Shall they, when the time comes for sending delegates to their own convention, send doubtful or uncertain men, or shall they send men who can be relied upon?

Will they test and try those offering for delegates before they commission them? Shall the voice of Missouri and Arkansas, whose people are overwhelmingly in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the old ratio be stifled by the minority, however respectable in character that minority may be? Or shall their delegates represent the sense, the judgment, and the will of the predominant element of the party?

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of having a spade called a spade in this next campaign. I am in favor of the parties declaring what they are for and what they are against. No party, I assume, should so declare itself that its utterances can be read in one way in one quarter and another way in another quarter, for I believe it will be held in each quarter to mean that which is intended for the other quarter. And I believe the party to which I belong, if it declares that which is in the mind and heart of the dominant element of the party, can go into the campaign with self-respect and with hope. I say with hope, because the skies are not so dark, the issue of the contest is not so fully foreshadowed, as that any man can confidently predict that this party or that party shall prevail without reference to what its nominations and platform shall be. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, this House passed and sent to the Senate a bill authorizing the issuance of 3 per cent bonds instead of 4 per cent bonds, as now provided by law, and also requiring that bond sales should be made in public. One good result has followed the passage of this bill in the House. The Republican press, with great unanimity, objected to any more secret bond sales. The greatest of the Democratic papers, the New York World, made such an assault from inside the Democratic party lines as to compel a halt on the part of the Administration, These various influences have resulted in an appeal by the President to the people of the United States. He called for one hundred millions of gold. They offered him nearly six hundred millions. These offers were made, not for gold-bearing bonds, but for coin bonds. This response from the people shows the absolute confidence in all parts of the country that the parity of our money will be maintained. Markets never flatter.

To the reasonable bill offered by the House the Senate has responded with a bill for the unlimited free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. The great silver leader, Senator STEWART, announced that this was mere dress parade, that it meant nothing, and that the bill had no chance to pass this House or to become a law. Debate here will change no votes. This debate is for the country, not for the House.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE], with his chart and his pointing rod, has given us an exhibition from Coin's Financial School. His presentation of his case has been pleasing and ingenious. But the question we have to meet is a plain and practical proposition. At the end of the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota, with his flowery rhetoric and polished periods, a plain and practical question was propounded to him by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL]. In that question is the meat of the whole discussion. "What will be the result if we accept the Senate bill and it should become a law? Will silver rise to par and circulate side by side with gold, or will we go to a silver standard, as all other countries have gone which coin silver at a ratio of 15½ or 16½ to 1, at a time when silver is worth from 30 or 32 to 1?" The reply of the gentleman from Minnesota was that silver would be enhanced in price; that gold would probably go to a small premium. This is the substance of his answer.

If gold should go to a premium it would disappear from circulation as has gold in all silver countries. Should gold go to a premium we would be upon a silver standard.

Mr. KEM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. I would like to ask him if gold is not at a premium now?

Mr. LACEY. Gold for a few days during the bond sale has been at a premium for a temporary purpose, a premium of less than one-half of 1 per cent; and now I ask my friend the question, has it retired because of that premium?

Mr. KEM. Oh, no.

Mr. LACEY. I understand, as a matter of fact, that gold is not circulating so generally since that premium has been put upon it. And if its circulation is checked by a premium of less than one-half of 1 per cent, what would be the effect of its going to a premium of 47 per cent?

It has been repeatedly said that France maintained the double standard for the whole world from 1816 to 1873, and that we should follow her example. From 1816 to 1873 France, instead of maintaining silver in circulation by giving it a peculiar value through her mints, merely accepted the commercial ratio and coined accordingly. It is one thing to coin at the commercial ratio and quite a different thing to attempt to change the commercial value by coining at a different ratio. France in 1874 found silver declining and stopped her coinage. We are asked to follow France. It is precisely what we are doing and have done. We are coining silver in limited amounts and maintaining those limited amounts at a parity with gold. Our country has no patent on her methods. She is simply doing what France, Germany, Austria, Belgium, Holland, and other European powers have been and are doing. She is using both gold and silver in about equal quantities, and maintaining the coined metal at an equality upon the old ratio. Our ability to do this with a limited amount of silver has been demonstrated, as has the power of other countries to do the same, by an indirect method of redemption, by receiving the silver for customs and other taxes and limiting the amount of the coinage. Should we open our mints to coinage without limit at the ratio of 16 to 1 I have no doubt the result would be the same as it is in every other country which thus keeps open its mints. Experience teaches us that under such circumstances only the cheaper metal would be coined. In fact, our own experience has taught us the same.

Prior to 1873 the market value of the silver in a silver dollar was greater than the market value of the gold in a gold dollar. This explains why we only coined about 8,000,000 silver dollars, all told, prior to 1873. Only the cheaper metal is coined under these circumstances.

However plausible and ingenious the arguments may sound and diagrams may look, the stubborn fact remains, as it has remained in all ages, that the unlimited coinage of two metals at a ratio different from the commercial ratio will result in the single use of the cheaper metal. There never has been an exception to it in history, and no gentleman upon the floor of this House can point to a single instance where this rule has proved false. France changed her ratio more than twenty times in a single century in order to maintain the two metals in concurrent circulation. She did not attempt to create a commercial ratio, she simply accepted and adopted that ratio as she found it. She accepted the ratio as the world's markets declared the relative value of the two metals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my friend from Iowa, who is always so frank and candid, and always so well informed, state to the House what was the bulk of the two metals at the time France fixed the mint ratio at 15½ to 1; and then, as he has said France simply adopted the ratio which she found, will he tell us where she found it, and how she found it?

Mr. LACEY. The answer to that question would involve a lengthy discussion. From soon after the discovery of America down to 1873 there was no very wide divergence in the ratios; the different nations of the world adopted slightly variant ratios substantially agreeing with the commercial ratio; and I grant you that to a certain extent, with a moderate output of silver, the ratios adopted in the various mints would influence the price. But yet it was the effort of France, it was the effort of our own country when Alexander Hamilton discussed the question at the time of the opening of our mints after the Revolution—it has been the effort of all countries to ascertain the real commercial ratio and to adopt it if they desired to maintain the coinage of both metals in general circulation.

Mr. KEM. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the commercial ratio between the two metals is not always changing?

Mr. LACEY. The commercial ratio was not very changeable during the time when silver was not produced in such great volume. It fluctuated slightly.

For the five years preceding 1873 the entire output of silver averaged annually only about fifty or fifty-one millions in the whole world; in the year 1894 the product was $216,000,000. This enormous increase could not do otherwise than influence its commercial value.

Mr. KEM. And now, if the gentleman will permit me, I want to ask him is it not true that silver maintained its commercial value or ratio until it was destroyed by law?

Mr. LACEY. I claim that it was not destroyed by law. I shall show that the law in Mexico that opened the mints without any limit whatever to silver has not sustained or restored its parity. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] has conceded that the fact that 900,000,000 of the population of the world remain upon a silver basis has not maintained its value.

Mr. KEM. Was not the value of silver maintained in other countries until it was destroyed and discredited as money in the United States of America?

Mr. LACEY. Two hundred years ago silver was the standard of the world. Gold was measured by that standard. The world used silver rather than gold, and there was not anything like an adequate supply of either.

Mr. KEM. So long as we did not discriminate against silver it retained its parity with gold.

Mr. LACEY. There has been no discrimination against silver in this country. It has been coined in great volume, as I shall show.

Mr. KEM. And when discriminating legislation in favor of gold was adopted, then the depreciation of silver set in.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. There has been no discriminating legislation in favor of gold. Gold has been coined, and silver has been coined. We have, as I have already shown, coined and put in circulation over $600,000,000 of silver in eighteen years, as compared with $90,000,000 in the previous eighty years. So that when the gentleman talks about discriminating against silver he is simply speaking against the record. We have, in fact, discriminated in favor of silver. No such superhuman effort has ever been made in the world as that made by the United States of America to restore silver to its old parity, to bring it back to the old value, in spite of the fact that $216,000,000 worth of the product was mined in the single year 1894, while $50,000,000 had been the average annual product a few years previous.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question pertinent to the issue? I do not ask it with any purpose of troubling or interrupting him.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My friend said a few moments ago that it was impossible that the great increase in the production of silver could have had any other influence than to affect the change of ratio between the two metals——

Mr. LACEY. No; I said that it had decreased the value of the silver.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has changed the commercial relation between the two.

Now, will my friend tell me why it was that from 1847 to 1853, within the course of a period of four years, I think, when gold grew so enormously in production as to increase 146 per cent in one year—at the end of the period—the bulk ratio, which had been 28 to 1, came to be only 4 ounces of gold to 1 of silver, that it did not produce a change in the commercial relations of the two metals, but a change only in the value of the money?

Mr. LACEY. The effect of it was to produce a decline in the price of silver.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A decline in the value of gold, you mean.

Mr. LACEY. No; a decline in both gold and silver, and for the simplest of all reasons, as I will undertake to explain in a moment. Last year gold reached the enormous product of $180,000,000. Did that decrease the relative value as between gold and silver? No; not at all. On the contrary, as gold has increased in production we have found silver declining steadily. I used to believe that the great discoveries in Colorado and in South Africa would, in the end, restore the relative proportion in value between silver and gold by increasing the value of silver or decreasing the value of gold, or both.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to have a little longer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The request was granted.

Mr. LACEY. The increase of annual gold production has not had the effect of increasing the value of silver, but on the contrary has lowered it. Why? Now, I will give you an illustration. Take your own town of Yazoo City; suppose the people there preferred wheat to corn as food, and ordinarily only raised enough of both for their food. In a good year they would raise wheat enough to take the place of both. What would be the result? Why, they would use nothing but wheat and the price of corn would be influenced by the increase in the production of wheat. So it is as gold has increased. Instead of diminishing the value of gold only it has cheapened the price of silver, and we have seen silver decreasing in value as compared with gold all the time, while gold has been taking its place. The increased discovery of gold has simply allowed that many more dollars to be used in gold coinage, and it has been absorbed, because it is preferred by the people, and this preference can not be prevented by legislation. It is not a pleasing conviction for those of us who desire, and honestly desire, to see silver fully restored, but it is a stubborn fact that we must face. The first blow really struck at silver was by the accumulation of the vast products of Australia and California, that enabled France and other countries to obtain gold and supersede to that extent the silver that had been substantially their principal money metal theretofore.

It is argued that this country has shown itself hostile to silver since the so-called "crime of 1873." Gentlemen grow indignant over this unfriendliness to silver and show an excitement utterly unwarranted by the facts. Prior to 1873 the United States had coined and put in circulation of silver dollars about eight millions, of other silver coin a little over eighty millions, making an entire silver coinage during the whole history of this country, when it is said the country was so friendly to silver, of only about $90,000,000. From 1806 to 1836 not one single silver dollar was coined—a period of thirty years. Since 1873 this country has rapidly taken silver into its circulation until now we are maintaining $625,000,000 of the white metal in our currency, not as a debased and depreciated money, but maintaining it absolutely on an equality with the yellow metal.

The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] appeals to Congress to "do something for silver." He says:

You have done nothing for it. Show that you are friendly to the white metal.

Let us examine a few plain facts and figures. Including the uncoined seigniorage in the Treasury, there is to-day stored in the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States $435,845,690 in silver bullion and coin. The greater portion of this metal is in representative circulation in the form of silver certificates. About 75 per cent of the silver coin circulates in the form of paper. On the other hand, the people hold the gold in kind. That the American people prefer gold to silver coin is evidenced by the fact that about 15 per cent of the gold circulation is in the Treasury and 75 per cent of the silver. This silver is doing good duty, better duty in the form of paper than it would in its own bulky condition of coin.

Do something for silver—
Says the gentleman from California.
This Government—
He says—
has shown itself hostile to silver.

On the contrary, there are to-day 13,500 tons avoirdupois weight of silver in the Treasury and subtreasuries of the United States. Under the Sherman law in three years and three months' time this Government bought nearly 6,000 tons of silver in the effort to furnish such a market as would restore the two metals to a parity at the old ratio. Personally I would be glad to see anything done that would tend to the restoration of the former unlimited concurrent use of gold and silver. But with the thirteen great commercial nations using silver only in limited quantities and maintaining their silver coin at a parity with gold, it is not a matter that we lone-handed can control. It sounds very patriotic to say, "Let us have an American system of finance; let us absolutely establish a relation between the two metals that exists nowhere else and compel the world to accept the valuation that the American Congress decrees." If we could fix values thus by law, there are other products that would deserve our consideration as well as silver. We should, if we had the power, legislate additional value into cotton and horses. The butter, eggs, and poultry products of Iowa exceed in a single year the entire silver and gold output of the whole United States of America. The silver and gold product of the United States for the year 1889 was of the commercial value of $79,445,120, while the poultry and dairy products of Iowa for the same year were $86,878,297. The silver-mining interest is a great industry, but is a small one when compared to many others.

Mr. KEM. When the gentleman talks about increasing the value of horses by law, let me say to him that if there was a universal law enacted by this Government compelling people to use nothing but gray horses, the value of gray horses would be greatly increased.

Mr. LACEY. No; the effect of that would be that the men who enacted that law would go out of business at the next election. [Laughter.] Why, a man from Nebraska the other day complained to me that electricity had "dehorsetized" the horse, and he was wanting a law passed by which the horse could be "rehorsetized"—restored to its old value. [Laughter.]

The value of coinage metals is not a local question. It is one affecting the whole world, and nothing short of the whole world can influence it. I will not burden my remarks with many figures, but will give a few that are worthy of the greatest consideration.

In 1873 silver, taking the ratio of 16 to 1, was at a slight premium of less than 1 per cent. The entire gold product of the whole world for that year was $96,200,000. The silver product of the world for the same year was $81,800,000. In 1890, the year that the Sherman law was enacted, the entire output of gold in the world, coinage value, was $118,848,700. The entire silver product of that year, coinage value, was $163,032,000. It will be seen that gold had increased in its annual product in seventeen years about 20 per cent, while silver had increased 100 per cent. In 1894 the gold product of the world was $180,626,100. The silver product, coinage value, the same year was $216,892,200. Comparing the world's product for 1894 with 1873, gold had increased 100 per cent upon its annual output and silver 150 per cent.

We constantly learn by observation and experience. We were told that the Wilson tariff law would produce a surplus of revenue. The actual test shows that it produces a deficit of from four to five millions a month, a fact which the radical silver men and Administration both alike ignore.

I formerly looked with great satisfaction on the increase of the output of gold. The fact that gold had increased in its output 100 per cent in 1894 as compared with 1873 gave me much encouragement that the increase of the gold product would tend to do away with the disproportion in the ratio between silver and gold. The results seem to have turned out differently, and the reason is simple. This increased gold output has displaced that much more silver, because the commercial nations all prefer it to silver; and thus we have precisely the opposite results from what we had been led to hope or expect. Nations have availed themselves of an increase in gold to substitute it for their silver currency, and thus depreciate silver still further.

The Sherman law was repealed in 1893, and we were told that it was a deathblow to silver. On the contrary, silver was higher in 1894 than it was before the repeal of the law. New methods of mining silver have not only increased the output, but cheapened the cost of its production. With silver at a little over 50 cents on the dollar, we had in 1894 the enormous product of $216,000,000 from the world's mines. It cost less than this to produce it or mining would have ceased.

A diminished revenue has affected the solvency of the Treasury. A mistaken tariff policy has increased our imports and turned the balance of trade against us. The nation is buying more abroad than it is selling there. The Treasury is paying out more than its income. This leads to timidity and lack of confidence along the whole line. A reserve that would be ample to maintain our credit when the revenues exceed the expenses and the exports exceed the imports is inadequate when these conditions are reversed.

It is said that a high measure of health is only necessary for unhealthy people, and so a strong reserve becomes necessary to support a Treasury in the condition that the Wilson bill has placed that of the United States. Individuals may escape punishment in this world; nations never do. There is nothing so sensitive as the public credit.

Addison, in his Spectator, described the public credit by an allegory:

A virgin sits at the end of a great hall. She is timorous, changes color, and is hysterical. She falls away from the plumpness of health to a mere skeleton in a moment. But her recoveries are wonderful. Secretaries sit at her feet reading dispatches to her from all parts of the world. As they read she changes color rapidly. Behind her are great heaps of money bags, vast piles of gold. A door flies open. Hideous phantoms enter; tyrrany, anarchy, and bigotry appear. The lady faints, the piles of money shrink, the gold turns to heaps of paper and fagots. Suddenly liberty, moderation, and the genius of the Government appear. Confidence returns. The lady revives. The money bags again expand. The paper and the fagots are changed again into guineas.

To have prosperity we must have confidence. With confidence, investments are made. With investments come prosperity. Under our present tariff law men hesitate to invest their money in business enterprises. The fact that $600,000,000 in gold is offered to the Government at a little over 3 per cent interest shows that there is a lack of proper opportunities for legitimate use of money. It is claimed that all these things will be reversed by the silver standard. The arguments for this bill are all based on the false assumption that the mere stamp of the Government alone creates value.

The true function of the Government's stamp upon metal is to guarantee its weight and fineness. Its value then depends upon the concurrent opinion and action of the whole world. If it is undervalued in one country and overvalued in another it flows to that country where it is overvalued and the equilibrium is restored. We can and do use gold, silver, copper, nickel, and paper. To maintain their value there must be some method of convertibility in the end into something that all the people want. Wampum was good money in New England two hundred years ago because the Indians valued it as an ornament. They exchanged beaver for it and beaver had a commercial value in Europe. The beaver was thus converted into gold or silver. Wampum, therefore, had a gold and silver value. And so it is we have methods by which our nickel, copper, and paper may be converted into gold; and although standard silver coin is not redeemed in gold, it is received for all public dues, the amount of its coinage is limited to an amount not beyond the ability of the Government to maintain the parity, and thus a method of convertibility is provided. This makes it as good as gold. Take away this convertibility and substitute free coinage without limit, and silver will be worth in coin whatever it is worth in bullion, and no more. All experience teaches us this. It has been so in all ages of the world.

Marco Polo, in the year 1254, gives us an interesting account of the first Chinese paper money, made from mulberry bark. I will incorporate it here in my remarks, as it is the first account we have in history of any substance of no recognized intrinsic value being used as money:

In the city of Kambalu is the mint of the great Khan, who may truly be said to possess the secret of the alchemist, as he has the art of producing money by the following process: He causes the bark to be stripped from mulberry trees, the leaves of which are used for feeding silk worms, and takes from it that thin inner rind which lies between the coarse bark and wood of the tree, this being steeped and afterwards pounded in a mortar until reduced to pulp, is made into paper resembling (in substance) that which is now manufactured from cotton, but quite black. When ready for use he has it cut into pieces of money of different sizes nearly square, but somewhat longer than they are wide. Of these the smallest pass for a denier tournois; the next in size for a Venetian silver groat; others for two, five, and ten groats; others for one, two, three, and as far as ten besants of gold.

The coinage of this paper money is authenticated with as much form and ceremony as if it were actually of pure gold or silver, for to each note a number of officers, specially appointed, not only subscribe their names, but affix their signets also; and when this has been regularly done by the whole of them, the principal officer deputed by the majority, having dipped into vermillion the royal seal committed to his care, stamps with it the piece of paper, so that the form of the seal tinged with the vermillion remains impressed upon it, by which it receives full authenticity as current money, and the act of counterfeiting it is punished as a capital offense. When thus coined in large quantities this paper currency is circulated in every part of the Grand Khan's dominion; nor dare any person at the peril of his life refuse to accept this in payment. All his subjects receive it without hesitation, because wherever their business may call them they can dispose of it again in the purchase of merchandise they may have occasion for, such as pearls, jewels, gold, silver; with it, in short, every article may be procured.

Several times in the course of each year large caravans of merchants arrive with such articles as have just been mentioned, together with gold tissues, which they lay before the Grand Khan. He thereupon calls together twelve experienced and skillful persons, selected for the purpose, whom he commands to examine the articles with great care and fix the value at which they should be purchased. Upon the sum at which they have been thus conscientiously appraised he allows them a reasonable profit, and immediately pays for them with his paper, to which the owners can have no objection, because, as we have observed, it answers the purpose of their own disbursements, and even though they should be inhabitants of a country where this kind of money is not current, they invest the amount in other articles of merchandise suited to their own markets. When any persons happen to be possessed of paper money which from long use has become damaged, they carry it to the mint, where, upon payment of only 3 per cent, they may receive fresh notes in exchange. Should any be desirous of having gold or silver for the purpose of manufacture, such as drinking cups, etc., they apply to the mints and for their paper obtain the bullion they require. All his armies are paid with this currency, which is to them of the same value as gold or silver. Upon these grounds it may certainly be affirmed that the Grand Khan has a more extensive command of treasure than any other sovereign in the universe.

But the Chinese paper money, it will be observed, was kept good by redeeming it at the mint in gold, silver, or jewels, and by receiving it for all dues and taxes. After Marco Polo's time a succeding Khan made the mistake of assuming that it was the stamp on the money that gave it value instead of the methods of redemption. He worked up so much mulberry bark into this money that it became valueless.

I have in my possession, and which I exhibit to the House, a sample of coin from Guatemala. Guatemala has a paper basis founded upon silver. The paper has shrunk in value to 30 cents on the dollar. Silver disappeared from circulation, and in order to make it circulate side by side with paper, each half dollar was cut into three triangular pieces, and here we have a Guatemala half dollar worth about 9 cents, being the one-third of an original Mexican half dollar. They have not put the words "In God we trust" upon it, but have put the sign of the cross instead; and this is a half dollar in that country. I understand that prices there are in proportion to the actual commercial value of the bullion in this so-called half dollar.

We are confronted with a few simple and clear questions in voting upon the Senate bill. First, Will free coinage increase the amount of our currency? Second, Will free coinage contract the currency? Third, Will it put us on a single silver standard? If, as the gentleman from Minnesota admits, gold will go to a premium, of course it will cease to circulate, If the gold is retired from circulation the currency will be contracted $600,000,000. That it will retire from circulation if it goes to a premium will not be disputed by any member of this House. When gold and silver rose to a premium in 1861 it disappeared at once from circulation as completely as though it had been thrown into the sea. That the same result would follow were either one of the metals to command a premium can not be disputed by any intelligent financier. It will be so because it always has been so.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] says there are 1,250,000,000 people in the world, and that three-fourths of them are doing business wholly upon the silver standard. By adding our 70,000,000 to the 900,000,000 he thinks there would be no question about silver being restored to a parity at the old ratio of 16 to 1, notwithstanding the fact that the other 350,000,000 commercial people of the world refused to join with us in the effort; that what 900,000,000 fail to do 970,000,000 would be sure to accomplish. This is placing an estimate upon this country in commercial matters unwarranted by any facts in our experience. Adding one more nation to the 900,000,000 Asiatics, Mexicans, and South Americans could not bridge over the tremendous chasm of 47 per cent that now exists between the free-coinage dollar and the proposed parity. As a nation deeply interested in the production of silver, and desirous of bimetallism in its fullest sense, we should carry our part of the load, if it is to be called a load. But the proposition that we have the power, lone-handed, to change the present condition as to the ratio between these two metals at a time when the world's product of silver is over two hundred millions a year is a very daring one, and I do not believe that it can possibly be successful.

Last summer it was proposed by our Democratic friends in Iowa to adopt a free-coinage 16-to-1 plank and appeal to the country upon the question of the free coinage of silver. It was boldly stated that by so doing we could be "prosperous like our neighbor, Mexico," which is coining silver at the ratio of 16½ to 1. I had a curiosity to personally examine the experiment, and went to Mexico for that purpose. In the campaign of 1894 I bought 300 Mexican dollars and paid 51 cents apiece for them; I sold them upon the stump, as an object lesson, at two for a dollar, or 50 cents apiece. Since then those dollars have been worth as low as 47 cents, and are now worth 53, a fluctuation of 6 cents, or about 12 per cent in a little over a year. I was curious to see whether the unlimited use of this kind of money was of the great advantage that our friends insisted that it was.

When I crossed the line into Mexico I had purposely retained among my money silver dollars, subsidiary silver, gold, nickel, copper, greenbacks, Sherman notes, gold certificates, silver certificates, and national-bank notes. Entering a broker's office on the Mexican side I took out this miscellaneous assortment of money and received in exchange $1.85 in Mexican dollars for every dollar of my money, although my silver was coined at 16 to 1 and the Mexican silver at 16½ to 1. Even American copper and nickel was as good as gold in this exchange. Afterwards, at other points in the Republic, I sold drafts at a premium, realizing from $1.87 to $1.88 in Mexican money. I found that there was not a cent of gold in circulation in Mexico, that the great bulk of business there was done with copper coins, and all upon the silver standard. After I had been there a few weeks I cashed my remaining drafts and found that I had more dollars left than when I started from home after paying all expenses. But they were 53-cent dollars, and it was a rude shock to my finances when I exchanged the remainder of them for American money upon recrossing the Rio Grande.

Mexico is prosperous under this system—that is, she is prosperous for Mexico. But the prosperity of Mexico in her brightest hour would be considered hard times in this country, even under the darkest days of the present Democratic Administration.

While I was in the City of Mexico a young carpenter from Denver, no doubt allured by the rosy accounts of some of the Rocky Mountain papers, came there for work. He found that he had been deceived, and that from 60 cents to a dollar a day in Mexican coin was the best he could get in the capital of our sister Republic. A collection was raised among the Americans to help him back home to a country where they did not have the free coinage of silver.

In discussing the question of wages and conditions in Mexico it would not be fair to blame any of their hard circumstances upon the fact that Mexico has a silver standard. When the disparity between silver and gold commenced Mexico was upon a very low-wage standard, and it appears that these wages have not been improved by the use of the single silver standard. The silver standard has not produced the hard condition of the affairs of Mexico, in my judgment, but, on the other hand, it has failed to produce the good times and prosperity among the working people that the radical advocates of silver teach that it would do in this country. The land is full of beggars, with here and there a city where they are less numerous. In the town of Guanajuato I found the laborers working on the streets at the heaviest of work eleven hours a day for 22 cents a day, Mexican money, equivalent to about 12 cents of American money. This low-wage rate would not support life were it not for the fact that the food that they live upon is produced by other labor equally poorly paid, and the price of the food is accordingly cheap. I went around among these men when they were eating their meals and found that tortillas and frijoles (corn cakes and beans) were their only food.

I asked a coffee planter who had a large plantation near Jalapa how the silver standard appeared to him. Said he:

It is a good thing for me. I pay my workmen 37 cents a day in Mexican money. I sell my coffee for 32 cents silver a pound, the price being based upon gold value, as it is all exported; on this I get the gold price in silver and pay the same old wages as in 1873, and it only costs me about 7 cents a pound to raise coffee. The silver standard with low wages thus proves very profitable to me.

Such facts are not encouraging to the laboring men of the United States to adopt the silver standard.

President Diaz has given Mexico a sound, safe Government. He has turned the banditti into rural police, and the prosperity of Mexico to-day, as compared with her past, is mainly due to a stable form of government. Highway robbery has been suppressed, the building of railroads and the opportunity for the speedy concentration of troops has rendered revolutions impracticable, and the question of the standard of value cuts but little figure in the matter. It is true that the high rate of exchange has discouraged the importation of foreign goods, and this has operated indirectly as a protective tariff. The same results, however, could be obtained with an adequate protective tariff and a different standard. Mexico has the same trouble maintaining her silver in circulation that we have had with our gold. Whatever the standard may be, the balance of trade must be paid in some kind of commodities, and for the purpose of finally settling balances of national trade gold and silver are mere commodities.

During the year 1895 Mexico shipped to the United States over 6,000,000 ounces of silver in bullion form and 4,700,000 Mexican silver dollars. Now, why did these 6,000,000 ounces of bullion leave the country where they had the full privilege of mintage and come to a country where the mints were closed? Simply because Mexico owed us an equivalent and paid us with the bullion at its market price. She shipped the $4,700,000 coin in the same way and for the same reason. She made no difference between the bullion and the coin, because under free coinage they were of equal value. And their experience teaches that instead of the coin bringing up the bullion value under free coinage the coin goes down to the bullion value. Mexico has no gold in actual use, and her entire per capita circulation is between five and six dollars. Unlimited free coinage does not expand their currency. It would not expand ours.

I asked a railroad man who had been in that country fourteen years how he liked the silver standard. He said it made no difference with him, for they had to pay him as much wages as he could get in the United States, or its equivalent in Mexican money, and something in addition to induce him to live there. I asked him why this was so, and why they did not pay Americans the same wages as Mexicans. He said they found it necessary to have some Americans in railroad work; that if a locomotive became disabled the Mexican would fold his hands and give up, while the American would go to work and repair the engine. I asked him then what would be the result if they fixed his wages on the Mexican basis. He answered, "I would go straight back to God's country." "And where is that"? said I. Said he, "Texas."

In the last Congress I proposed the experiment of coining the American product for three years, charging as the seigniorage the difference between the bullion value and the coinage value. This experiment I thought would be an aid in the effort to secure international agreement. But the proposition did not meet with favor among the silver men, who preferred that the seigniorage on this limited coinage should go the mine owners instead of into the Treasury. How much silver we can carry at par with gold no one can state with certainty. I believe it is our duty as a great silver-producing nation to coin so much of this metal as we can maintain at a parity; to go beyond this under existing conditions would be to change our financial system and adopt the single silver standard.

We have been assured in this debate that all prices are fixed by the amount of coin of ultimate redemption in stock in this country. It is claimed that silver is not recognized as money of ultimate redemption, and that this has reduced the prices of commodities. On the contrary, silver is recognized as coin, and therefore money of ultimate redemption, but it is true that the law provides that this coin shall be maintained by the Government at a parity with gold.

In 1873 we had no money of ultimate redemption of any kind, and had no immediate purpose of redeeming any of our promises.

In the future we hoped to arrive at a specie standard, but prices were as high in 1873 or higher than at subsequent periods after we resumed specie payment, thus disproving the theory that values are predicated wholly on the stock of money of ultimate redemption. We had our present monetary system in 1890 and 1891, and we had a prosperity that we would all like to return to. We have had no change in our monetary system, but have had a radical change in our tariff, and to this change is due much of our embarrassment, if not the whole of it.

No doubt hostile legislation in all the great commercial nations of Europe has seriously affected the price of silver, a legislation that we can not change, but the assertion that this country has greatly influenced this price adversely by its legislation is made without sufficient regard to the real facts. In 1873, when the so-called demonetization act was passed, we were on a paper basis, and had neither silver nor gold. We resumed specie payment on the 1st of January, 1879, but the Bland-Allison Act was passed in 1878, so that when we did return to a specie basis we coined both gold and silver with very great liberality.

That the prices of many products have declined since 1873 is beyond question. The decline has been in both necessities and luxuries. The discovery of the diamond fields in South Africa has greatly depreciated the value of diamonds. Bessemer's discovery, and the competition produced by building up mills under a protective tariff in the United States, has cheapened the price of all articles made out of steel. Cheaper methods of production and manufacture, and the use of automatic machinery, have lowered the prices of nearly all manufactured goods. The protective tariff in America heretofore gave us the home market, and the ingenuity of our countrymen devised machinery to cheapen production. Cheapness thus legitimately produced, and accompanied with better wages for the laboring people, is not a subject of regret. Cheapness produced by throwing into competition with well-paid labor the products of poorly paid workmen is entirely a different thing.

Much has been said by our Democratic friends about their platform of 1892. It was read and reread in the debates in the last Congress, and again discussed in the present Congress, and the most conflicting claims have been made as to what it meant. The fact that the gold-standard men of New York and the silver-standard men of Mississippi both stood upon it and claimed that it voiced their views shows that the hand that drafted it was that of a skilled workman who knew how to face both ways at the same time. This double meaning was well understood when the platform was drawn and adopted, and it was because of this equivocation that it was adopted. I am reminded of a lady acquaintance of mine, whom I will call Mrs. Smith (because that is not her name), who in war times went to the provost-marshal at Little Rock with another lady friend to take the oath of allegiance. Her friend took the oath first, and Mrs. Smith, who was a good Southern woman, hesitated. Said she, "I can't take that oath; you know how I feel." Her friend said to her, "Oh, go on, Mrs. Smith, and take it. God will know you don't mean it." And in the same spirit the Democratic party adopted the platform at Chicago.

The question, Mr. Chairman, before us now ought not to be one of politics. It is a plain, practical, business question. We are using silver, gold, and paper money to an amount of more than $1,600,000,000. We are maintaining them all as the equal of the most valuable money in the world. The proposition of the Senate bill is to abandon this system and adopt a method that of necessity will put us upon a single standard and retire one-third of our circulation. That this plan will be detrimental to the interest of the farmer, of the laborer, of the mechanic, of the manufacturer, and of the business men of this country I have no sort of doubt, and shall vote to nonconcur with the proposed amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the President in his annual message, calling our attention to the financial situation, stated that it was "in such a perplexing and delicate predicament as to require prompt and wise treatment." Ere this House had completed its organization, ere it had an opportunity to consider and deliberate upon that perplexing and delicate predicament, its counsels were disturbed by a second message, a bugle call of war's alarms. Its effect upon the country was magical. The old veterans donned their uniforms of blue, the "Johnnies" arose to the opportunity, and above the strains of "Dixie" were heard "America" and "Rally Round the Flag." [Laughter and applause.] Everybody was patriotic, and the front of grim-visaged war was no longer to be smoothed but wrinkled. Its influence upon this House was marvelous. All political lines were obliterated. Even our Populist colleagues, for the time being, forgot their calamities, the nation's "dire desolation," and the inherent cussedness of the old parties.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] fell upon the neck of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], while the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] silently invoked blessings upon both. [Laughter.] Even our Chaplain, remembering that his Master came into the world to bring not peace but the sword, constituted himself a recruiting officer, not alone for the service of the Lord. [Laughter and applause.] While in this blissful and beattic condition, a third message was received, and we were again Republicans, again Democrats, and the wail of the Populists was renewed in this Hall. [Laughter.] The message that produced this second great change informed us that, notwithstanding the beneficent workings of the tariff-reform revenue law, notwithstanding the fact that we had recently borrowed more than $162,000,000 in gold, partly by a private sale of our bonds to a speculative syndicate, the reserve fund had fallen so low that the paper of the nation was about to be discounted and dishonored in the counting houses of the world unless Congress should immediately authorize the President to sell gold bonds in quantities sufficient to redeem, cancel, and destroy the greenbacks.

The Committee on Ways and Means, just constituted, promptly recognized the perplexing and delicate predicament, and with a conception that was miraculous and a delivery unparalleled, although apparently painless, labored and brought forth twin children of remedy and reform. [Laughter.] One, the tariff bill, we speedily passed; but somehow or other it has become lost in the shuffle at the other end of this building. The other, this House bill, whose mutilation by the Senate the distinguished chairman of the committee so earnestly deplores. A number of us on this side of the House were unable to support this bill either by voice or vote. I shall not reiterate the reasons that prompted me to vote against it, but shall content myself with saying that if Democratic imbecility in the way of financial legislation has reduced this Government to such a state that it becomes necessary to sell bonds in times of peace, the recent opening of bids at the Treasury Department demonstrates that the laws upon the statute books are ample therefor. It also demonstrates that the plain people of this country have not only an abiding faith in the integrity of this nation, but in its ability to keep its every promise and redeem its every obligation. Again, the bid of J. P. Morgan & Co. for $100,000,000 of our bonds at a fraction over 110⅜ stamps the former sale to his syndicate at 104½ as unwise, if not infamous and in violation of public trust.

Mr. Chairman, the first section of this bill provides for the free and unlimited coinage of silver—the world's product—upon individual account, and this has involved the House in an almost unlimited discussion of the silver question in all its phases. I shall tax your attention briefly, first, because my time is very limited. Second, because every possible argument, pro or con, has already been presented upon this floor. Many gentlemen have not only exhausted the subject but themselves and the House. [Laughter.]

Third, because I do not deem it necessary to promulgate my views here in order that they may be seen and read by my constituents at home, for upon every stump in my district I proclaimed my opposition to the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon individual account, and I have had no occasion to change my views. Every dollar coined or issued by this Government must be the equal of every other dollar, not only for debt-paying but for purchasing purposes in the markets of the land. Every dollar heretofore coined or issued is now the equal of every other dollar, and to open the mints of this country to the free and unlimited coinage of silver upon individual account, brought from wheresoever you will and by whomsoever you will, will of necessity reduce us to silver monometallism. Such a policy is not founded in reason, justified by logic, or approved by example.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do believe that a considerable quantity of silver can be coined and infused into the currency of this country with perfect safety. You can not determine the amount thereof to a mathematical certainty, or by an application of the theories of the doctors of finance of either school, yellow or white. I believe that the bullion in the Treasury ought to be coined, gradually, if you will, Mr. Chairman of the committee, yet coined, and when coined, should be used to redeem and retire the Treasury notes issued in payment of its purchase, to the end that they shall no longer be used by the speculator in robbing the reserve fund of its gold. Let us, then, both as an object lesson and as an experiment, open our mints to the coinage of our own silver, placing a duty upon all foreign bullion equal to the difference between its value as bullion and coin. Our rapidly increasing population, the development of new enterprises, the growth of business, trade, and commerce, call for the coinage of more silver to maintain our circulating medium at its present rate per capita, not to speak of the inevitable loss and destruction constantly occurring, nor to mention the use to which it can be put in the displacement of the smaller denominations of paper money.

On motion of Mr. CROWTHER, the time of Mr. BURTON of Missouri was extended.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we who entertain these views will support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG]. The bill, with that amendment, substantially embodies the views of a large majority of the people of my section, irrespective of political faith or party affiliation. To you, gentlemen, who are burning incense in the temple of the golden god, to you on your knees before idols of silver, we present this business-like, practical, American solution of this problem. Quit your dissertations, your metaphysical disquisitions upon a subject concerning which you can offer us nothing practical; join us upon this platform, do something, and a disgusted people will rise up and call you blessed. [Laughter and applause.]

[Mr. OGDEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 2904, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CERTAIN SURVEYS, FLORIDA.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a privileged report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is a joint resolution calling for surveys for a modified project in the State of Florida.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida.

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $1,500 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for a survey and plans for the improvement of the entrance to Biscayne Bay, Florida, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers in his letter of February 26, 1895, and for a survey and plans for the construction of a breakwater at Palm Beach, Florida; and the Secretary of War is directed to report the result of such surveys, together with plans and estimates for contemplated improvements, to Congress at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand, this is a resurvey of an old project and not a survey of a new project.

Mr. HOOKER. That is right.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONNEAUT HARBOR, OHIO.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present another joint resolution of the same character, relative to a survey of the harbor at Conneaut, Ohio.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is a resurvey also?

Mr. HOOKER. Yes; and the proposed project will cost much less than the one under which operations are now being conducted.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 98) directing the Secretary of War to cause Lieut. Col. Jared A. Smith, Corps of Engineers, to submit a plan and estimate for the further improvement of Conneaut Harbor, in the State of Ohio.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause Lieut. Col. Jared A. Smith, Corps of Engineers, to submit a plan and estimate for the further improvement of Conneaut Harbor, in the State of Ohio, and to transmit the same to Congress at as early a date as practicable.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—to the Committee on Printing.

Joint resolution (S. R. 43) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds, bulbs, etc., as has been done in preceding years—to the Committee on Agriculture.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota;

A bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889;

A bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims;

A bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory"; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896."

SUBSIDENCE OF THE WATERS OF THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. HOOKER. I present one other resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the subsidence of the waters of the Great Lakes of the North has reached an alarming stage, reducing the depth of the water in the channels and harbors of said lakes to such a degree as to seriously interfere with navigation; and

Whereas great loss to those who are engaged in the carrying trade on these lakes is caused thereby, endangering their vessels and the lives of those who navigate them; and

Whereas the subsidence of the water has never been so great as at the present time, being a total of some 5 feet below the normal height; and

Whereas it has been proposed that a series of dams or jetties, constructed and maintained at or near the outlet of these several lakes, would necessarily raise the surface of said lakes: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives any and all information that he may have bearing upon this subject.

Resolved, That he be directed to give an estimate of the cost of making a survey of the outlet of Lake Erie at the head of Niagara River, of the outlet of Lake St. Clair at the head of the Detroit River, and of the outlet of Lake Huron at the head of the St. Clair River, with a view to the construction of such dams, jetties, locks, and such other work as may be necessary for the proper carrying out of the object aimed at in these reslutions; it being understood that these surveys shall take into consideration the feasibility of such constructions, and whether they would accomplish the desired object of increasing the depth of water in the lakes.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOOKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUTCHESON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HANLY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. HENRY of Indiana, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORSE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and at 10 o'clock take another recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, the two sessions to be devoted exclusively to the discussion of the bill which has been under consideration.

The SPEAKER. In the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DINGLEY. In the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and accordingly the House is declared in recess until 8 o'clock this evening; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will please occupy the chair.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes) the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition that our Government commit itself to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, as proposed by this bill, is one fraught with untold danger to the future interests of our country.

On this question long speeches have been made, books and essays without number have been written on the subject, yet by a little reflection the whole question is very simple, may be told in a few words, and can be easily understood. In fact, by brevity and concentration the question can be readily solved, while, on the other hand, to expatiate and enlarge tends to obscure and confuse.

With the former aim I will give the substance of my views in the ten minutes' time allotted to me. At the same time I believe what I shall say will reflect the views of my constituents.

As I understand the question, the free coinage of silver means that the Government shall require the Director of the Mints, without charge and without profit to the Government, to coin all the silver and silver bullion that shall be brought to the mints for that purpose, and shall deliver to the owners all the coin which that silver will produce. In other words, that a man may carry to the mint $1,000 worth of uncoined silver, procure the officers of the mint to mold it into coin, and walk away with $2,000 in his pocket.

The measure is the same, be the amount hundreds or be it millions. Unlike the farmer who takes his grist to mill and goes away with the product of his wheat in the equivalent of flour, the silver owner goes to the mint and when his metal is stamped into coin goes away with twice the value of what he took there.

This act provides "that the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver," the dollars to be "of the weight of 412½ grains troy of standard silver."

The mints, if this act should become a law, shall be opened to the owners of American mines for the coinage of their silver. In like manner they shall be open to the silver mines of all other countries and to the importers of foreign silver, who may all alike pour their metal into the mints of America, and forthwith receive in silver dollars double the value of their uncoined metal.

OVERPRODUCTION DEPRECIATED SILVER.

Mr. Speaker, the overproduction of silver has had the effect to depreciate its value. If it should become as plentiful as copper or lead its value would depreciate to the comparative value of copper or lead.

That silver has depreciated in value in consequence of its abundance is conceded.

You take a gold dollar and melt it, and the metal will sell in market for a dollar or thereabouts. You melt a silver dollar and you can sell the metal for only 50 cents or thereabouts (say 53 cents). Now, as one or both of those metals depreciates, there is no reason why the Government should stand good for that depreciation and continue to give to the mine owner as much for his produce as it did when the metal was twice its present value.

If this bill provided that the Government might purchase silver at its market value in sufficient quantities to meet the ordinary wants of commerce and then proceed to coin it and put it into circulation, I apprehend there would be little or no objection to it, except on the part of the few who own the large silver mines and those who are acting in their interest. The reason why there would be little opposition to such a measure is because the profit of the coin would be in our Treasury and thus inure to the benefit of the nation by adding millions to her revenue.

Silver dollars coined from such source would be as welcome to the public as if they had been the product of free coinage. Yes, more so, because the public would know that the Government was behind them and the more able to make its silver currency good, by reason of the profit of 100 per cent in the Treasury for all the silver coin thus placed in circulation, which profit would endure so long as the coin remained in circulation. It would be enjoyed by the Government, and through the Government by all the people of the United States, who compose the Government.

The proper course for the Government to take in the future coinage of silver, Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment, is a plain, straightforward, honest course that will address itself to the judgment of every candid business man, namely, have the coinage equal to the wants of trade, but kept within that limit. When more silver currency is needed go into the open market with other purchasers of silver and buy as much as shall be necessary for the time being, and pay what it is worth. After having made the purchase put the metal through the mint and when coined put the silver dollars in circulation. In that case it is apparent that for every million dollars put in circulation, a million of dollars or nearly that amount of profit is added to our revenues, while at the same time the silver dollars in the hands of the people are worth their face value, and why? Because they bear the American eagle on one side and the Goddess of Liberty on the other.

Why is not that plain, fair-dealing, honest business way of treating the silver question satisfactory? I will answer that it is satisfactory to the mass of the people, but it is far from satisfactory to a few bonanza kings who would make sudden and colossal fortunes by the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, the free and unlimited coinage of silver, if adopted by the passage of this bill, would bring untold disaster upon the financial condition of our country. Gold would take its flight or become an article of commerce. The silver of the world would flood the mints of the United States, and the American Government would perform the sorry task of gratuitously and incessantly coining their silver into a currency that doubles its profits to the owners without adding one dollar to the revenues of the Government.

If that state of things should come to pass it would not be inappropriate to take from the silver dollar the effigy of the American eagle, and in its place set a mill and Uncle Sam with great industry, but no wages, grinding out silver dollars to customers from the Pacific States of America, and also from Mexico, South America, Russia, Australia, and all other silver-producing nations of the globe, who, with smiling faces, depart, carrying away with them American silver coin double the value of the metal they had when they first visited the industrious grinder. [Applause.]

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest diffidence that I appear before this House to discuss the great question of the free coinage of silver. Nothing could induce me to do so but the great advantage which I believe the enlargement of the volume of our metallic money would produce among all classes of our people. Upon it I believe depends the prosperity of the farming interests of this land, and upon the success and prosperity of the farmer depends the prosperity of the people at large. Hence the discussion of the question involves the discussion of the depression of the farming interests and the causes which led to it. Just as we find the question of free coinage agitating the country, so we find the question of the depression in the farming industry thrilling the public mind.

Public men may be likened to physicians, who are supposed to apply remedies for known diseases or maladies to which the body politic has fallen heir.

The diagnosis of the disorder now afflicting this country has been made by many physicians, and remedies have been applied, but the disease grows in malignity and its effects are seen in the widespread and increasing bankruptcy. Solomon said, "Great men are not always wise," and while the chief physicians may be great in their professions, they are not infrequently wanting in wisdom in the application of remedies. As a plain business man, whose avocations have been in channels which might naturally have led me to different conclusions but for patient search for truth—as a layman, I may be pardoned for having the temerity to suggest that the remedy is the restoration of our silver money to its wonted place in our bimetallic system. What is the history of the silver dollar as unit of account? What is meant by free coinage? What are the advantages to be derived from its adoption? I find myself surrounded by some of the most distinguished silver men in the country, and it would be folly in me to go through that which, to most of you, would be considered the A B C of the silver question.

Both gold and silver have been used as money since the dawn of civilization, but the silver dollar piece is of modern origin. It was a silver coin to which the term "dollar" was originally applied. It was the silver dollar that our first ancestors' coining law made the unit of value. The silver dollar as it now exists is the only dollar we have ever had that is the same to-day that it was in the beginning, and if an honest dollar be desired it completely fills the definition.

The dollar originated in the sixteenth century in Joachim Valley in Bohemia. A nobleman—a German count, I believe—issued pieces of silver of uniform weight and fineness as a medium of exchange. They soon became popular and went broadcast into circulation. They took the name of valleyers from the valley in which they were produced. Thence came the German thaler, the Danish and Swedish daler, the Italian toller, and the widely known dollar, all of which, remember, were silver.

Now, let us come down to our own country. In 1786 the American Confederation seeing the need of money passed a law making 375.64 grains of pure silver the "unit of accounts." There was no mint, no United States coin, and so this was done to meet the 4s. 6d. or 54d. accorded the thaler. In 1787 the Constitution of the United States was adopted, and in that instrument Congress was authorized to coin money and regulate the value thereof. Not, however, till 1792 did Congress order money to be coined, and then it was directed that the unit of accounts should be the dollar; and this year gold was also coined, the ratio being fixed at 15 to 1, that is to say, 15 ounces of silver was equal to 1 ounce of gold. The dollar was fixed at 416 grains, .900 fine, halves, 206, etc.

In 1837, silver getting a little the advantage of gold, the ratio was changed to 16 to 1 and the number of grains in a dollar fixed at 412½, principally at the instance of Thomas Benton, and hence called the Benton dollar. Not until 1849 did Congress authorize the coinage of gold dollar pieces. In 1853 some apprehension was felt lest gold would drive the silver out of the country under the operation of what is known as the Gresham law, and so the halves and quarters were demonetized and debased. Silver dollars were at a premium. The Benton dollar was allowed to remain as it was—412½ grains .900 fine—but the halves instead of being 206¼ were placed at 192, remaining at the same to this day; the quarters, 10-cent pieces, and half dimes in the same proportion—two half dollars not even at this day being possessed of as many grains of silver as the one-dollar piece.

In 1873 a bill was passed through Congress without anybody particularly noticing it, doing away with the Benton dollar and substituting a trade dollar, and giving it a legal-tender quality for only $5. When this was done silver was worth 3 per cent premium in gold. In 1875 even this small legal-tender quality was withdrawn from it by act of Congress. Thus the silver dollar was assassinated and silver as a money metal destroyed for the time being; and here the history of the dollar stops until the Bland bill passed in 1878.

So far, then, we find the silver dollar was the unit of account. Indeed until the year 1895 it was never questioned.

Having gotten thus far with this historic coin, let us turn for a moment and inquire into some of the causes for national distress. Chief among them may be stated war, famine, pestilence, disease, despotism.

In the language of a distinguished Senator, "it is certain that twenty-five years of profound peace and abundant harvests" can not be a cause for national disorder.

From pestilence and disease, under a great and merciful God, we have been singularly free. But despotism—the despotism of the money power, the worst form of despotism—has fastened its poisonous fangs in the national body, and it is from this that we seek to be released, that the body may recover its strength and accustomed vitality. We hear a great deal about the dishonest dollar. I shall not dwell on this. It answers itself. It is difficult, however, to understand how it is that if a silver dollar is a dishonest dollar by what means strict honesty will be injected into it by international agreement. It is wrong to impute intrinsic value to money. It is the measure of value imparted to it by law.

It is, therefore, all wrong to impute intrinsic value to money, all wrong to attribute intrinsic value to gold and silver. It is a fact that there is not enough of either or both to make their intrinsic value an inducement to mine them. Miners would close the mines if it were only for the intrinsic worth as commodities that these metals were sought.

To-day we see great corporations issuing bonds maturing hundreds of years after date, payable in gold. Statistics show that the debts already contracted in the world payable in gold are as 95 to 5; that is to say, to be a little clearer, there is not 5 per cent of gold in the world to meet the legitimate demands of indebtedness that may be made on it on any one day at this time. In other words, the vast indebtedness of the world that matures from day to day and which is stated as redeemable in gold is really not so redeemable by over 95 per cent.

The mass of gold and silver metal is, as we know, small viewed as a commodity. Now, what would be the utility of this small mass of metal were it not that it was needed for money. It is made useful to man by imparting to it power by process of law.

That power which the law imparts to the metal is the power to pay debts, taxes, and fines, the power to discharge all assessments and measurements which the law enforces. This power increases the use of the metal, creates its social functions, and renders it a necessity to those who seek to meet their obligations.

The great Cernuschi said:

Price is value expressed in money; therefore if there is no money there is no price. "Money is without price;" its value has a special name called power. It is the law which confers on gold and silver the privilege of forced currency, and without the intervention of law there can be no forced currency and without forced currency there can be no money. Lawmakers can not increase the amount of gold and silver, but they can give it power, and nature does the rest.

Continuing, he says:

Silver being thirty-six times the volume of gold, but only eighteen times its weight, if the standard was silver only prices must be eighteen times more than if gold alone were the standard.

So he goes on and shows that paper money is nothing but money having power imparted by law in the way of forced currency; and while you are obliged to accept it, still you can require others to do so and thus far there is no difference between paper and metallic currency or money. But the difference is immense as regards issue, the issue of gold and silver being automatic and that of paper governmental. Says he: "Let all nations say that neither silver nor gold shall be money and the intrinsic value will at once sink to zero." Their utility does not compare with iron, lead, copper, zinc, but "the importance and fixity of their mass make them suited for forced currency and they are the only metals that do." By free coinage both metals are turned into money automatically when needed, going back into bullion or the arts when not. Accord silver the same privileges as are accorded gold, no more and no less, is what is demanded and of right should be granted.

The very day the President of these United States signs the bill providing for the free coinage of silver that very moment will silver bullion be par; that is, at a parity with gold bullion. As commodities in the raw state they can not then go below their denominational value, for the law will then treat alike and coin them into that value whenever and by whomsoever such transmutation is sought.

The advantages to be derived from the free coinage of silver are so many and varied that it is difficult to understand how the judgment of men can be so warped as not to perceive them; and I can only attribute their failure to do so to the vast and subtle influence exercised by the money centers under the stimulus of desire to increase the value of money by its contraction and to get cheaply the products of labor; and I can but feel strengthened in my own convictions when I find so many of the greatest and most disinterested thinkers of the world have thrown the weight of their judgment in favor of the continued use of both metals as money, such men as Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Webster, and a host of others whose names are household words wherever intellectual and moral supremacy are respected.

One great advantage of free coinage would be the rehabilitation of the farmer—the restoration of the great agricultural interests of this country. Sir Isaac Newton said, when one of his theories was confronted with a fact, "Theory must give way, as there is no arguing against fact." Now, the monometallist theory was that we might possibly stand the coinage of 50,000,000 silver dollars; beyond that he would not "seek to penetrate the veil," except to say that beyond this amount gold would be driven out of the country. Fact said after we had coined $400,000,000 we had more gold than we started with.

Theory said that coinage of silver would cause great exportation of gold. Fact said as silver coinage increased gold imports increased and silver exports increased.

Theory said the one standard of gold will give us good money and necessarily bring a ready and more profitable sale of farm produce. Fact said produce fell steadily just as silver fell, and the farmer was ruined. Theory said supply and demand are the great regulators, it matters not what is the medium of exchange. Fact said, notwithstanding the short crops of Europe, famine in Russia, and much increased demand for our wheat, it sold for less than when the demand was not so great and when these great exigencies did not exist. Now, what is applicable to wheat is applicable to all the export farm products of this country. If it can be shown that the great fall in agricultural products began with the demonetization of silver; that the greatest competitor of our farmer was created at the same time and contemporaneously with this outrage; that this competitor has, by reason of the fall of silver, caused by demonetization, been able to export his produce and undersell ours, when he had never been able to do so before; that, as silver continued to decline as a commodity, so did our farm produce; that pari passu with the decrease in our farm exports the exports of this competitor increased—if these things can be shown as facts, then it would seem that theory would have to give way to them. And the only sensible conclusion to come to must be, that if we would recover even in part what we have lost, we must retrace our steps.

Let us look at the example of India, which shipped only 250,000 bushels of wheat to England before 1873 and in 1885 had gained 49,000,000 bushels on us. In 1878 we sold England 153,000,000 bushels of wheat, bringing us $190,000,000; average, $1.24 per bushel. India this year sold England 4,000,000 bushels. In 1886 our sales dropped to 57,000,000 bushels, and India's were 39,000,000 bushels; India gained 900 per cent; we fell off 69 per cent. We lost $140,000,000 compared with 1878; India gained $49,000,000 thus compared, supposing wheat the same price in both instances. Wheat in New York in 1872, $1.30; silver per ounce, $1.32; in 1873, $1.17, and $1.29; in 1878, 95 cents; and $1.15; 1886, 77 cents and 99 cents, and so on. India shipped 250,000 bushels in 1873, 1,500,000 in 1875, 37,000,000 in 1882, 40,000,000 in 1884, and 50,000,000 in 1890. Now we see that the exports of our competitor have steadily increased since 1873 and ours have steadily fallen off. We see the price of silver has year by year declined in price and so has wheat. But these facts have been worn threadbare.

When there are abundance of dollars in circulation he stands a chance to get some of them, just as the little urchin does to get some dimes for his tin bank. When either the dimes or the dollars are gotten, civilization is stimulated, because a want is created. The laborer gets stored away some silver dollars. He sees a lot and he buys it. He saves more and he wants a house, and so on. And, as was said by a distinguished Texan, every silver dollar carried a want behind it. These wants must be satisfied. Enterprise is stimulated and every enterprise enlarged. The man is a better citizen. Thrift will follow in the wake of effort, and he gathers fruit from the tree of prosperity and drinks of the well of happiness. Without free coinage he can not get the dollar. Let him see it and he strives to get it. Free coinage makes money elastic. It is the duty of Government to coin the metals and give it power, so that a sufficiency of paper issue may follow with both as a basis automatically convertible.

Let us look at the debts of the world. According to the census of 1890 the total debt of the world in June, 1890, in round numbers, was $28,000,000,000, less sinking fund. This is an increase over 1880 of $118,000,000. Of this the United States, including State and county debts, are responsible for $1,200,000,000. This includes city debts and school districts as well. It is very clear that there is not enough gold to meet our indebtedness, to say nothing of the debts of the world, for I have not included railroad debts, farm mortgages, etc. Great railroads are now issuing bonds payable one hundred years after date, and I have heard of one which offered bonds eight hundred years after date, all payable in gold. The date of maturity is being placed further and further off for obvious reasons.

If a grocer—

had only 5 eggs and were to take orders for the delivery of 100 on demand when he knew he was unable to obtain more, most people would consider him a fool.

Yet Governments are doing this thing and railroads are dodging it by trusting to finding a hen to lay them many years afterwards. What is to become of these vast debts unless silver is restored, the production of it stimulated, and that already extracted from the earth utilized as money metal? The time can not be far distant when the finances of the world will be shaken from center to circumference. In this country, even were the circulation not undergoing constantly a contraction, the increase of population is constantly decreasing our per capita. We can get relief from no source except from silver. We know that gold and silver maintained their parity for centuries, and under our Government till 1873. We know that England had her unit of value as silver till 1816, which was her silver pound; that until the United States demonetized silver every first-class civilized nation in the world, except England, allowed free coinage of silver; and that since that time all have followed in our wake in denying it, we being the principal producer of the metal. All these things have started the people to thinking. I have the honor to be one of the people, and attention is now riveted to this great subject. The farmer is thinking, the merchant is thinking, the mechanic and the laborer are thinking. A great wrong has been perpetrated on the people, and the people are crying for redress. They are conservative. They have waited patiently.

This despotism has blighted our farming industry until now the combination of the money power of England and the United states with the Republican party has left it without hope, enervated and dying. It has seized the governing power of this country, and we stand appalled as we see the grand old ship of state tossed on the ocean of financial uncertainty without a rudder and England bidding its captain to be of good cheer as she sees it drifting farther and farther from the harbor of safety.

Doctrinaires may preach to us of honest money and of sound money and use all the misleading ear-catching phrases that the vocabulary furnishes, but the fact remains that the disease is growing, the patient is becoming more enervated and the remedies less and less efficacious. If I were asked what should be done, I would say return to the treatment under which the patient prospered. I would say distrust, as imperfect, that spurious science which conflicts with experience and common sense, and caters to the imagination with vague phrases without clear or precise definition to explain them.

I would say, return to the money of our Constitution. I would tell the present-day financier that everything he prophesied has failed; that all he claimed for his schemes has been abortive; that when he said gold would be driven out of the country, it happened that the reverse occurred; that when he foretold better prices for farm products, lower prices were realized; that when he said that this was because the supply was greater, I would show him that in the very year when the supply was less the prices were less. I would tell him that when he said wages would advance, they declined; that when prosperity would prevail, lo! there was more depression and deeper ruin.

I would say to Democrats, look at your party record, your party promises, your party principles. Consider the experience of the past. Invoke your common sense to interpret the scenes around you. In what convention, in what Congress, in what assemblage, State or national, has the Democratic party discarded silver? There are those who have voted for free coinage of silver in this House, but now say they have studied the question and are for sound money. Sound money! Nice sounding phrase.

They have, like Saul of Tarsus, had their eyes opened and been converted. They have heard a "sound" from above and now condemn as a political crime that which before they deemed a virtue.

There came the Harmonious sound on golden hinges moving, so melodious that the harp of Orpheus was not more charming, and the hypnotic effect was instantaneous, and in the midst of our own party, which since the foundation of the Government has stood for free silver, we have the spectacle of a division in our ranks produced by the word "sound." Sound money means nothing but unsound money.

Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to show how the Democratic party has stood in the past, and hence to show the inconsistency of the position now attempted to be maintained by the gold-cure element of the party, let me call your attention to the striking similarity of the condition of our farmer now to that of the farmer in the time of Pharoah.

There was a great famine in Egypt and the land of Canaan, as you will recall. The farmers flocked to Joseph and told him there was no bread in all the land. Joseph was a farsighted man. He was a man of God, but with a "Wall street" eye. The Good Book tells us that he gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan, and exchanged it for corn. He had known that the famine was coming, and had saved up his corn from year to year. The next year the people again came and said, "Give us bread," and Joseph demanded money, which they had not, and so he demanded their cattle. They gave up their cattle to keep from starving. A third year found the famine unabated, and a third time the distressed farmers of Egypt and the land of Canaan came and said, "Give us bread or we perish." He demanded money, but they had none; he demanded cattle, but of these they had been stripped the year before. Then he demanded of them their lands; and so, hunger speaking through their distress, they gave up to Joseph their lands. Now they are no longer independent people, but want has made them slaves, and when they again appealed for bread, and knowing that a demand for money, cattle, lands, would be in vain, Joseph demanded their persons, and required that one-fifth of the product of their labor should be given him.

There is a money famine to-day among our tillers of the soil. They have no money, their cattle are gone, their lands are mortgaged, and more than one-fifth of what they produce must go to keep alive the despotism of the millionaire kings of this land—to kiss the hands that smite them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, he must be blind who fails to see the analogy of our times to those of the day of Joseph. Here was the money power that exercised its despotic power over the people of that country till they were reduced to slavery.

He who looks back a quarter of a century and before silver was demonetized will not fail to recall the fact that tramps were unknown in that day. He will recall that it was a rare thing to see young ladies begging for employment and strong and muscular young men supplicating for work. He will recall that there was plenty of money elsewhere besides in banks; that prices were advancing and prosperity awaited industry; that labor traveled the same road with industry and both were linked with happiness; that bright eyes and rosy cheeks and ruby lips greeted him when he returned home after his day's labor; that the merry laugh of his little ones made his heart glad and his home happy.

How is it now? The sunken eye and lines in the careworn face tell in eloquent tones that misery and want sit side by side in this once happy home; that the little ones ask for bread and get a stone; that the monster death is welcomed and is not infrequently invited as a guest. Are such things to continue? Is there no remedy? In the one case the Democratic physician was in attendance for nearly one hundred years. In the other the Republican doctor.

Up to 1860 our finances were dominated by the Democratic party. Up to 1873 no change had been made in the money of redemption. The country still had the money of the Constitution. This instrument says:

No State shall coin money or make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts.

Gold and silver, mark you.
It says:

Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

Clearly this refers to gold and silver, and not money till coined, and it is equally as clear that it was not intended that Congress should strip the States of the right to make gold or silver, as money, a legal tender.

Daniel Webster said:

Gold and silver at rates fixed by Congress consiitute the legal standard of value in this country, and neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard or to displace that standard.

I need not go over what was done by Congress in 1792 and on up to 1873. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee said that fifteen times as much silver was coined under the Bland Act, or since 1873, as was coined from 1792 up to 1873.

This is an assertion not sustained by facts. There were $87,000,000 of legal-tender silver coined before 1873, or about one-fifth as much. But this does not affect the question; I merely correct the statement.

Up to February, 1857, certain gold and silver coins of foreign countries were legal tenders in this country. Hence the great necessity did not before that exist for our coins. Mexican, Peruvian, Bolivian, Chilean, Central American, French silver coins were full legal tender. From 1857 to 1873 our silver dollars were legal tender.

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I find that in the Forty-fifth Congress 97 Democrats voted for the free coinage of silver, 10 Democrats against it.

In the Senate a substitute was carried requiring the purchase, etc., of silver and coining standard silver dollars.

A Republican President vetoed this and the bill was passed over the veto by 118 Democrats against 22 voting in the negative. In the Senate 25 Democrats for and 9 against.

The Matthews resolution, a free-coinage resolution, passed the Senate by 23 Democratic affirmative votes and 7 negative votes, and in the House 116 Democrats to 23 against.

Forty-sixth Congress: 100 Democrats voted for free coinage and 9 against it, and 107 to 4 for another free-coinage resolution.

Forty-seventh Congress was Republican.

Forty-eighth: Senate and President Republican.

Forty-ninth Congress: 96 Democrats for free coinage, 70 against.

Fifty-first Congress: 101 Democrats in the House voted for free coinage, 12 against it, and in the Senate 27 Democrats for and 3 against Plumb's free-coinage resolution; in the House 113 Democrats for and 22 against it.

Every Democrat in the House and Senate voted against the Sherman law, 1890.

In the Senate, 1891, 24 Democrats voted for free coinage and 1 against it.

In the Fifty-second Congress, in the Senate 20 Democrats for and 9 against free coinage; in the House, 118 to 64.

In the Fifty-third Congress 101 for, 116 against; in the Senate, 18 to 18.

In 1894 the seigniorage bill passed the House—136 Democrats for, 50 against.

Since 1840 national Democratic conventions have been held to proclaim the platform of the party and to name candidates.

Never till 1873 had the coinage laws been attacked. Since then the Democratic party has endeavored to restore silver to its legitimate place by the side of gold at the United States mints.

In 1880 our platform declared for honest money consisting of gold and silver.

Of 1884, "we believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution."

Of 1888, reaffirmed the platform of 1884.

Of 1892, we hold to the use of both gold and silver as standard money, etc., and, as Senator DANIEL aptly said, whatever meaning may be given to "we hold to," it certainly does not mean that "we let go."

The platform of 1892 was clearly intended to be a free-silver platform, as the inside history divulged after Mr. Cleveland's inauguration established beyond a doubt.

Here it is, and I have never seen any denial of it:

BAYARD, VILAS, M'PHERSON, AND WHITNEY FAVORED IT IN 1892.

DENVER, COLO., September 3.

The Rocky Mountain News publishes an editorial in which Mr. Thomas M. Patterson gives a full account of the action of the subcommittee on resolutions at the last Democratic national convention. The subcommittee consisted of Mr. Bayard, Senators McPherson, VILAS, and DANIEL; John Atkins, of Tennessee; L. F. Garard, of Geogia; Mr. Jones, of Missouri, and Mr. Patterson, of Colorado.

Mr. Patterson says:

"When the plank was first read and analyzed I suggested that it was uncertain and gave room to cavil about its meaning. To remove this uncertainty I requested that the words 'coinage of gold and silver, etc.,' be inserted. I distinctly stated that I would be content to omit the ratio for such coinage, leaving that to Congress; what I did want was the Democratic party clearly and unequivocally committed to true bimetallism. Senators VILAS and McPherson opposed this and so did Mr. Bayard. Each gave his reason. It was not that they were opposed to free coinage—on the contrary, they favored it—but the word 'free,' as applied to coinage, was so liable to be misunderstood in the East and Northeast that it would, through this ignorance, lose the party many votes, which should not be allowed. Mr. Bayard was particularly earnest in asserting his fealty to silver and told in graphic and pathetic language the service he had performed for the white metal."

Mr. Patterson says that after considerable discussion Mr. Atkins, a professed bimetallist, offered the following substitute for the money plank:

"We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver for the owners thereof, without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, etc."

"I realized in a moment," continues Mr. Patterson, "that it was a declaration for free coinage as clear as though the word 'free' was used a dozen times; but before committing myself I turned to Senators VILAS and McPherson and Mr. Bayard and asked, "What do you think of it, gentlemen?" They indicated that they wished to consider it.

He then conferred with Mr. DANIEL, who approved the substitute and said, in response to the assertion that the other side would not accept, "Yes, they will. They are honorable gentlemen, and when they say they favor free coinage and would declare openly for it, but that the word 'free' is dangerous and will lose the party many votes in the East and Northeast, they mean it. This amendment avoids their only objection, and we should adopt it." Mr. DANIEL then urged the adoption of the substitute and was much surprised when Senator VILAS announced that they had decided against accepting it, claiming that the original plank was a declaration for free silver. Mr. Atkins also voted against the substitute.

Mr. Patterson stated that Mr. Whitney came to the committee room, and in answer to a question was told to have the word "free" inserted in the monetary plank. Mr. Patterson continues:

"He studied the proposition a moment or two, and in a very decided tone exclaimed: 'That's a vote getter. They did not object to it? Let me talk to them.'"

He called Senators VILAS and McPherson aside and talked with them quite earnestly for fully five minutes. He returned apparently quite disappointed and said:

"It's no use; they object to the word 'free' because it is a very objectionable word in the Northeast in connection with money, and to adopt it would lose the Democracy of that section of the country. I then explained the Atkins amendment, whereupon he again said: 'They will certainly consent to that. I think they will. That's a vote getter. I will talk to them about it.' Again he held an earnest conversation with the Senators; returning looking more crestfallen than at first, he remarked, 'It's no use; they will consent to no change.'"

There is not a break in the Democratic line on this question in its history till the Fifty-third Congress and until the despotism of the money power of this country, backed, or rather governed, by England, issued its manifesto of its demands. Gold monometallism is the financial principle of Wall street, England, and the Republican party.

No convention, no party has ever thrown off the mask and openly avowed gold monometallism. Republicans generally and some who are partially Democrats advocate it. But none have had the boldness to propose it as a plank in a party platform. None have had the courage to offer a bill which, without some mantle to cover its meaning, would disclose its purpose and intent. The last and most ingeniously devised cloak is international agreement.

You who applauded to the echo Mr. Cleveland's message on the Monroe doctrine should pause before you go farther, and remember that the Monroe doctrine, while applicable to the encroachments of the Holy Alliance, which alliance has long since perished of its own weight, being crushed out of existence by the tread in the march of civilization, should be applied to despotism as well, and we are told that we must wait for international agreement. This is disingenuous. They mean England.

If England were to proclaim the free and unlimited coinage of silver to-morrow, would you wait for any further international agreement? You dare not. As says Rothschild or England so says Wall street or Morgan and Belmont. As says Morgan, etc., so says the Republican Congress and the money power of other parties. You speak of precedents, must we wait for them? Has the United States ever waited for precedents? Does she not make them? Do her people wait for them? Did they wait for precedents when that gallant commodore said, "Our country, may she ever be right, but our country, right or wrong"? Did they wait for precedents in Boston Harbor at the unfashionable tea? Did they wait for precedents at Lexington? Did Old Hickory wait for precedents at New Orleans, or old Fuss and Feathers at Lundy's Lane? Did they wait for precedents when they penetrated the primeval forest, crossed rivers, mountains, and lakes, and tracked the buffalo across the Rockies? Did they wait for precedents when the Merrimac and Monitor met in Hampton Roads and revolutionized the art of naval warfare? Did they wait for precedents when in two of their battles in the civil war more men were killed than have been killed in the English army for one hundred years? Did they wait for precedents when a Paul Jones, in 1812, made England lower her flag as mistress of the sea? Did they wait for precedents when another than Paul Jones, a Confederate privateer, swept the seas and causes England to pause now before going to war, because she knows that a hundred Admiral Semmeses would destroy her commerce? Do they wait for precedents when they appropriate more money for veterans than any nation in the world appropriates for its standing army—except Russia.

Did the Republican party wait for precedents, particularly from England, when they passed the McKinley bill and claimed that it placed American goods in every market of the world alongside of hers? Did the people wait for precedents when they paid their national debt, when they built 180,000 miles of railroad, when they established an internal commerce such as the world has never known? Did they wait for a precedent to steam up the Hudson under a Fulton, when they chained the lightning and obliterated time and space, when Edison whispers across the ocean?

Did we follow England's precedents in standing armies, in aristocracy, in religion, in penal laws, in policy of conquest, etc.?

When and in what particular have we waited for precedent?

International agreement! You mean only England, and you can not disguise it. She has us by the throat. She had us by the throat in 1776; we threw her off. She had us again in 1812; we beat her off. She now has a death grip on us; let us assert our manhood and strike. We are totally unlike, except in language. She has her standing armies; we none. She has her aristocracy, governed by a House of Lords; we a Government of the people. She has empire dispersed, severed, and scattered; we continuous and concentrated empire. She has no silver mines; we mine half the world's supply. Her agriculture is secondary in importance; ours is our greatest industry. We sell more than we buy; she the reverse. She has the Established Church; we religious freedom. She has her peasantry classes; here the poorest boy may become President. She has her policy of conquest; we just the reverse. We are the greatest producers of raw material; England the greatest consumer. She draws interest; we pay it. Her interest is to cheapen what she consumes; ours to enhance the price. She is dependent on us; we independent of her. She is for gold monometallism; if for no other reason, we should be opposed to it.

We raise millions of bushels of wheat, corn, potatoes, rice, oats, millions of bales of cotton, produce millions of tons of iron, and England rejoices to see that since 1873 prices of these commodities have fallen 43 per cent.

The great expanse of our territory, with soil unsurpassed in fertility, with means of transportation unequaled, a people the most progressive on earth, increasing with a rapidity unparalleled, should cause this to be called the American century.

Had one of you been born in 1800, you would have been 4 years old when an American revolutionized the trade of the world as he steamed up the Hudson in the first steamboat. Sixteen years of age would have brought you to the time when England demonetized silver, but in this same year 58 persons were under sentence of death in this same England, one of whom was a child 10 years of age.

If a man shot a rabbit he was hanged; if he injured Westminster Bridge he was hanged; if he cut down a young tree he was hanged; if he stole property valued at 5 shillings he was hanged. In this same year there were 223 capital offenses recognized by the law, and this, too, after 3,000,000 freemen in America had declined to be governed by England's precedents. When 22 years of age he would have seen the first iron plow, but when 48 years of age he would have seen a native of my own State—McCormick—revolutionize farming with his reaper. When 44 years old his heart would have swelled with pride that a fellow-American had made it possible to communicate thought by wire, and still another shortening the distance to be traveled over by the ocean birds by his storm and wind charts. When 73 years of age he would have looked back and seen that during that whole century gold and silver had been the money of the Constitution of the United States, and the ratio had been practically 16 to 1, and they had been maintained at a parity. He would have seen that this had been done for fifty-seven years, without waiting for a precedent from England. When 76 years had whitened his hair he would have seen the whole world with bated breath admiring your fellow-countrymen, Edison and Bell, who had achieved the greatest wonder of the age. When the allotted age of man had been reached he would have congratulated himself that he had lived under the Administrations of Adams, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Van Buren, Harrison, Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Buchanan, Fillmore, Lincoln, Johnson, Grant; all free-silver men.

The unit of value then served its purpose well. The unit of value now has dislocated business and destroyed agriculture in this country. If one unit does not suit, common sense would suggest that another be tried. If uniformity in prices is not established by one let us try another. Mr. Lincoln always tried another general whenever General Lee defeated one of his generals. It is a common-sense rule that when one thing fails to produce desired results try another, more particularly when you have another that has produced desired results. Argument has worn threadbare. Nothing new can be said on the silver question.

Common sense teaches more than the erudition of doctrinaires on all practical questions. An old miner in the lead and zinc regions of Missouri told me that he had sunk more shafts than any man in Missouri, as many as 365 in one year, and he had never struck lead or zinc at a single location selected by a geologist. I took a location recommended by a geologist before I met this old man and I have got a hole in the ground now, but no zinc or lead.

Berkey says:

The essence of money is the immaterial principle or power to represent value. Money never reaches a point when it can be used as an article of real value.

Money, therefore, if issued by a stable government, a responsible one, whose people possess ample property and valuable products, the power (value) of the issue corresponds to the value of the property and products of that country.

The dollar of the United States represents property which the Government is entitled to receive when necessary for its wants, and a tax warrant will produce all the money ever issued by it, if it takes every dollar's worth of property in the country.

We can float any money at a parity with any other money when the United States, with its $65,000,000,000 of wealth and its 70,000,000 of people, are behind it. I have no fear on this point. We want more money, a larger circulating media, and that which will of necessity be more easily disseminated in the avenues of industry. One-thousand-dollar notes held in bank will not do. We are told that there is plenty of money in banks. Yes; and the reason is that people can make more by holding for lower prices, and hence it remains there.

We have 180,000 miles of railroads. In my old bullet-riddled, cavalry-ridden, battle-scarred State we have more miles of electric roads than England and France together; more than all Europe, except Germany.

Talk about maintaining silver at a parity with gold! Start a dollar on a straight line from the northwest corner to the southeast corner of Texas and it will travel a distance as great as from Chicago to Boston.

This State alone can support 50,000,000 people. On 165,000 square miles it can raise all the food products of the country; on 19,000 square miles it would produce the 12,000,000 bales of cotton for the world's supply and have a territory as large as the State of New York left for a cattle ranch, after deducting all of the desert land. No country presents such a field for internal commerce. Fifty million in Texas and population would not be as dense as it is in Germany. Place them in New Mexico—not as dense as in Belgium. In the Dakotas—not as dense as in England. We have over one-half of all the fresh water on the globe. Let a silver dollar start up the Mississippi River and then up the Missouri River and it will find duty to perform on a navigable stream for a distance equal to the distance from New York to Constantinople, on each side of which stream are broad fertile valleys capable of producing every known fruit, flower, cereal, or textile plant, with broad acres of virgin forest with every known wood.

Our country is composed of 18 republics as large as Spain. One of 31 States, each as large as Italy. One of 60 States, each as large as England and Wales.

East of the Rocky Mountains we have a river flow with 80,000 miles of river bank, counting no stream under 100 miles in length, while all Europe has only 34,000. Our area of arable lands is 1,500,000 square miles, while China supports 400,000,000 people on 1,300,000 square miles.

Take the whole of Europe, says a writer, except Russia, and mold it into one great empire and you can lay its map down on the map of the United States three times west of the Hudson. We compete with England in our varied industries in all the markets of the world, feed our own people, and have some to spare, this, too, whether we are a gold, a silver, or a bimetallic country. It is not strange that England and New England should be in harmony now, though very inharmonious on the tea question in years gone by. Both would starve without the West and South.

Look at Montana, that State which JOHN SHERMAN said, with the one exception of Alabama, he would call the treasure State of this Union.

Lay it down on the map of the United States and it reaches from Cleveland, Ohio, as far south as Richmond, Va., and this is no desert land. No Sahara here, but rich in mineral, timber, and agriculture. Idaho, if similarly placed, would reach down the eastern coast from Maine to middle North Carolina, its southern boundary extending to Columbus, Ohio, while its western line would reach Toronto, Canada. California would extend from London down well into Spain, or from Boston to Charleston. Look what an internal commerce we now have. It is 97 per cent of our whole commerce.

With that great expanse of soil, unequaled in fertility, boundless forests, mountains swelling with every known mineral, a people of such wonderful energy—need we go into the scientific researches of doctrinaires to proclaim that we will have our own system of finance, that we will coin silver and gold freely, limiting it only by the restriction of nature, and defy the world to prevent the two metals being kept at a parity?

These great States are developing with giant strides. Tell me that this great country and people will be compared with Mexico if we have free silver! One fact is well to observe here: In every silver-standard country in the world to-day the balance of trade is in its favor; in every gold-standard country it is just the reverse. In every silver country they are selling more than they buy; in every gold country they are buying more than they sell. Which is the healthier condition?

I need not answer. Tell me that free coinage would build a wall around us? What nonsense! That we could have no dealings and commercial relations with any other than silver countries? What absurdity! "It is better for a man to know less than to know so much that ain't so." It is claimed that we would lose our trade with gold countries. This seems equally as absurd, for the reason if silver is a cheaper money, then nations as well as people are certainly going to the markets where they can buy cheapest, and if cheap money means anything it means that it induces trade. The trade between China and England would long since have ceased.

For a moment let us look at our carrying trade. Our carrying trade in American vessels is a commentary in itself on your financial views. (See Treasury Report Commerce and Navigation. See difference between the United States as a gold and as a free-coinage country.)

American vessels carried—	Imports.	Exports.	General average.
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
1859	64	70	70

Difference in favor of free-coinage period, 44½ per cent, 61½ per cent, and 57 per cent.

In the same report you will see that our ships have some cause for felicitation—that there are some silver countries—for while they carry only 2.6 per cent trade to and from Europe, the great gold continent, they carry 50.7 per cent of that of North America, 19 per cent to South America, 18.3 per cent to China, 22.7 per cent to Africa, and 50.7 per cent to Oceanica.

One word about the Gresham law. Gresham lived in the time of Queen Elizabeth. A great many debased and mutilated coins got into circulation and Gresham claimed that such a state of things would drive good money out of circulation; that people would save up the good money and pay out the bad, and that it would seek foreign countries to pay for goods imported, because the bad money would not be received, etc.

Experience tells us that when we began the coinage of the silver dollar we had $168,000,000 in gold, and notwithstanding that the great exponents of the Wall street financiers predicted that we might coin $50,000,000 without driving gold from our shores, but more than that would certainly do it—notwithstanding this, we look ten years afterwards and we had coined 215,000,000 silver dollars and we had $612,000,000 in gold. To-day we have 415,000,000 silver dollars and hold some $650,000,000 in gold.

Mr. Blaine said—I quote him as being a wise Republican, as well as a great one:

In Europe and America the great mines of the Pacific Slope will be closed and dead. Mining enterprises of the gigantic scale existing in this country can not be carried on to provide backs for looking-glasses and to manufacture cream pitchers and sugar bowls. A vast source of wealth to this entire country is destroyed the moment silver is permanently disused as money.

Again he said—and these remarks will be found on page 821, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress:

I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in the end throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole standard or unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money.

Again he says:

It is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly ruinous to tens of thousands.

It is a very remarkable fact—and I refer to the Report on Commerce and Navigation for the detailed statement—that since the United States Government has kept the account of gold and silver separate, which has been only since 1864, there has never been a year or period embracing a number of years in which the imports of gold exceeded the exports except beginning with the year 1878, when we began to coin silver again. After coining standard silver dollars (250,000,000 of them) our gold, instead of having left us for foreign lands and having been driven out by silver, had actually increased $354,000,000; and then, just as if it had been established that the $625,000,000 of gold would be driven out of this country, it is triumphantly asked, "What would be the result of the withdrawal of one-third of our circulation?"

I would say in all candor that it would be very disastrous. But the application of Josh Billings's saying that it is better to know less than to know so much that ain't so comes in with peculiar force right here. If I assert that free coinage of silver will certainly produce an epidemic of smallpox, I might then immediately turn to you and ask, What think you of an epidemic of smallpox in America? One is just as probable as the other, and both equally unsupported by reason or argument or fact. But a gold monometallist is necessarily in favor of the withdrawal of the greenbacks and Treasury notes and the retirement of the silver dollar. What think you, may I ask, of the conditions of things if over one-half of our circulating medium is retired? I answer in his own language: Financial stringency, currency famine, commercial panic, business stagnation, wreck, and ruin. These are his own words, and they express just the condition of things which must obtain if his policy prevails.

I can hardly think that it will be insisted that the free coinage of silver, as well as gold, would not create as great a demand for silver as for gold. Certainly so in this country. Then if so (and the demand becomes unlimited as soon as free coinage is perfected) how is it possible for there to be such a thing as a commodity of silver except at an advance over its mintage value? This you must admit, for common sense will tell you that this is obliged to be so. Then the only danger that the United States would be subjected to is that flooding of the country with silver so often predicted by those with whom you are in sympathy. Now, I can not believe that even so zealous and so recent converts to gold monometallism as some of the Democrats here can believe that we are in a position to be hurt by any silver flood in this country. It certainly would not make things go down. It would make prices go up, coming nearer home. It is very true that twenty years ago, if you had been in Congress, it would have taken only 4,000 bushels of wheat annually to pay your salary. Now it takes 8,000; and it may be that a flood of silver would enable the farmers of this State to pay your salary with 3,500 bushels, and yet they would get more for their product.

Do you not know that there are 1,550,000,000 people on this earth, and that 1,250,000,000 of them, or four-fifths, use silver alone as money, and that only 280,000,000 use both gold and silver, the remaining 20,000,000 using nothing?

Do you not know that since the discovery of America—403 years—the production of gold and silver has varied not as much as $4,000,000 annually, and that at this time the difference in the amount of gold and silver money is merely nominal? Do you not know that the ratio of 16 to 1 in this country tends to take silver to those countries which have the ratio of 15½ to 1 and 15 to 1 instead of drawing it hither? There has not been a year since 1864 that we have not exported more silver than we imported. But be not deceived. Russia, Germany, England, France, Austria-Hungary, Norway, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal, Italy, Holland, Belgium, and the Netherlands all have use, and constant use, for the silver now on duty and on legal-tender duty too. They can not part with it if they wanted to; but if they could part with it, then in order to throw it on the mints in this country they would have to lose 3 per cent besides the freight and insurance, our ratio being 16 to 1, theirs 15½ to 1 and 15 to 1.

You know as well as I do that the price of wheat and other commodities is not regulated by the supply in a single country, but by the world's supply. Now, gold monometallists give the supply of gold and silver in certain years in the United States only. They say there has been a decrease in the product of gold. They have stated this, no doubt, with a view of showing that gold is on the decrease and silver very much on the increase, and hence gold is getting, by reason of scarcity, much more valuable, and the ratio should be very much greater than the one suggested and the one at present existing in this country. Now, what are the facts which are covered up in this statement? They are that gold has steadily increased since the year 1873, with the exception of a year now and then falling a little behind the year before, but this occurred seldom. Since 1890 the increase has been steady. For the three years 1891, 1892, and 1893 we have the following world's production:

Year.	Gold.	Silver.
1892	146,000,000	152,000,000

This is the world's supply, and when you speak of price you must not expect the product of the United States alone to regulate it.

Here is another remarkable statement: That the present silver dollar under free coinage would be worth only half of its present value. Do they really mean this? Are you not obliged to admit that prices will fluctuate more under a single standard than when both metals are used? Gold can be cornered much easier than both metals, and gold certainly does not circulate and silver certainly does. But they insist on rating silver as a commodity, when under free coinage it would not be a commodity except as the price would exceed the mintage price or value. How could hogs, wheat, and other commodities be regulated by the price of silver as a commodity, when silver would necessarily be without price as the unit of value? Money is without price, and price is value expressed in money.

It is certainly a strange fallacy which seems to have taken hold of old as well as new converts to gold monometallism, that law has nothing to do with the value of money.

Is it necessary for me to call your attention to the fact that commodities have come down steadily pari passu with silver since 1873? And yet in the face of this you insult the intelligence of the farming people of this State by likening our condition under free coinage to the Confederate money times. Metal money should be irredeemable; it is itself the redeemer. Confederate money was irredeemable paper. How can you see any similarity between the two? Nature limits the one, the other was limited only by the capacity of a printing machine. Do you think it is altogether ingenuous to spread before the people as a proposition that free coinage is likely to make silver dollars as plentiful as Confederate money; and if so, do you mean to say that it would be as worthless? Free coinage puts into circulation no money that is redeemable.

Now, about doubling prices for 50-cent dollars. It is said such "doubling" would certainly give the farmer no more than present prices for 100-cent dollars. Do they mean it, and is it possible that they give the farmer credit for so little intelligence as to suppose that he does not know this? If I said to him, "Sir, if you sell wheat at 10 cents a bushel, it will not bring you as much as if you sell it for 20 cents a bushel," I would not think that I had made a statement of very great interest to the farmer and one which it required much intelligence to comprehend.

But may I inquire who ever saw a 50-cent American silver dollar in this country? You must produce one before such propositions can be propounded.

There is about as much sense in the one as there is in the other. Both self-evident propositions; and the farmers are no fools to suppose that there are any very great metaphysics behind either of them.

But the farmer knows another thing: that there has never been in these United States a standard silver dollar that would not at any time purchase just as much as a gold dollar. I defy anyone to name the time and place. English capitalists offered Mr. Cleveland several millions of dollars more for the bonds of the United States if Congress would consent to that which no first-class nation has ever humiliated itself by doing, namely, to have inserted in the bonds that they would be payable in gold. Congress refused to do this, and hence our bonds were sold for 4½ premium; and notwithstanding these people said they would give more for them if gold was inserted (presumably they would not do so unless this was done), they did buy them, and these same bonds are now selling for 24 premium instead of 4½.

You are mistaken about these farmers of this country. This silver question is not such a mighty one as you would have them think now. They think that common sense and business judgment is the way to settle this matter, and it is the way it is going to be settled. The farmer knows that more money is needed to conduct the business of this country. He can not be fooled by your telling him that silver will be so plentiful that it will be as worthless as Confederate money. He knows better than that. He knows, too, that the quantity will be limited by nature, and he knows, too, that gold and silver are keeping pace with each other in the yearly production. He is not fooled by your talk of the production in America any more than he would be misled by talking about the production of wheat here. He knows as well as you do that the price of a commodity is regulated by supply and demand, and the supply and demand must be the world's supply and the world's demand. So it has not as much study about it as you would lead him to believe. Common sense! Common sense!

High-sounding phrases may fool us all sometimes, may fool some of us all the time, but they will not fool many of us this time. The old farmer knows something and he knows that there is to be no distribution of fifty-dollar packages of silver on court days to the people of any section. He has common business sense, and you have advised all to apply it. He knows that prosperity no longer exists in this country with the agricultural class. He believes it to be criminal to let the present condition of affairs remain as they are. The crucial test is approaching. He knows that his condition can not be worsted and can be improved. He is not apt to follow any financial theory that will further contract our money and consequently diminish further the prices of his products. And he means to be heard. He knows that time will set all things even and that he must treasure up the wrong. He can look only to the Democratic party. This party, my party, is treasuring up the wrong, and under the standard of free coinage for both gold and silver will correct it. We will yet achieve this great consummation. We will have to fight up hill and against strongly entrenched positions, but a battle won without struggle would be won without honor, and as our "fortune keeps an upward course," we are sure to be "graced with wreaths of victory." [Applause.]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said by the advocates of free silver and so much written by them in relation to the marvelous prosperity of Japan and the wonderful growth of its manufacturing interests and extension of its commerce on account of the use of silver as a currency, that I desire to have read for the information of the House an extract from a letter of John A. Cockerill, a very intelligent and reliable newspaper correspondent, written from the capital of Japan to the New York Herald, and published in that paper a few days ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

Having no prejudice on the financial question, I wish to state a few facts. Japan is not happy in her finances. I know that Count Okuma and other financiers of his school love to talk about the wealth that Japan is accumulating through buying in the markets of the world for gold and selling for silver, but the facts do not warrant their claims. Japan, by force of circumstances, belongs to the chop dollar sisterhood of Asia. Some five years ago, when she maintained her silver yen at something like par, she went along smoothly and she enjoyed fair prosperity. With the gradual decline of the yen her business has been demoralized and she is now entering upon, it is very generally agreed, a season of depression and hard times.

It has taken the people and the business world here quite a time to readjust themselves, but they are at it now with a vengeance. The penalty of depreciated currency is now being paid. For the last four months there has been a steady demand upon the part of salaried men for an increase of pay which would enable them to live comfortably. As the purchasing power of money has grown less the prices of commodities and the necessaries of life have steadily increased. The Government led off recently by doubling the salaries of all its foreign employees. This has been followed by a number of big corporations. Among the corporations doubling the salaries of their agents and employees may be mentioned the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha, the Nippon Tetendo Kaisha, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the Mitsui Bushi Goshi Kaisha, Japan Brewing Company, First and Third National banks, the Mitsui Bank, and the Naigai Yotatsu Kaisha. These are representative concerns in the mercantile, manufacturing, and banking departments of the country.

People who know Japan will see at a glance what they stand for. They have yielded to the demands of their people after the usual struggle, and this is the beginning. Wages are everywhere being pushed up and in all branches where skill is required. Men are lying down on their contracts and begging for concessions. Bankruptcy stares thousands of honorable business men in the face. This depression is not due in any sense to the war with China. Everybody knows that Japan made money during her war. The Government is richer than it ever was. The decline of silver has upset everything, and great uncertainty attends all business enterprise. The first thing that a business man does in the morning is to look at the value of the fluctuating dollar. It may be worth 53 cents or it may be worth 49. Exchange flutters and shifts, and considerable sums are lost to commercial men every day if they have foreign trade relations. Japan could not go to a gold basis, no matter how much she tried. That would mean universal bankruptcy.

Her general finances are deplorable and the condition must grow worse until business has settled down to the basis of a 50-cent dollar. Not a business concern in Japan will escape the effect of this curtailment of profit incidental to a 50 per cent increase in salaries and wages. The man who encourages a silver basis for the people of the United States by pointing to Japan as a glorious example is simply deceiving himself and his countrymen.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I know that my views on this financial question are not of importance either to my country or to my party, but I desire to call attention to a few facts that affect us particularly in the Southern country. In my district and in the South we need protection for our coal, our iron, our timber, and our marble, and I do not intend to follow off after this heresy of free silver. It is not surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic party, or a great majority of the Democratic party, should be in favor of free silver. We remember that the Democratic party before the war stood in favor of State banks and wildcat money.

We remember that after the war, when we were heavily indebted, the Democratic party declared that the debt was so enormous it never could be paid, and advised the repudiation of the national debt. The Republican party, however, determined to readjust the finances on a basis alike just to the creditor and the Government. When the Republican party proposed to resume specie payment, the Democratic party, its statesmen, its newspapers, and its orators, declared that resumption was impossible. I remember that General Ewing, of Ohio, said that the morning Mr. SHERMAN undertook to resume specie payment in this country we would hear "the crack of doom." But specie payment was resumed.

Then commenced an era of unexampled prosperity in this country. Another fad soon after took possession of the Democratic mind in this country. It determined and declared in favor of irredeemable paper money; and you remember the noble fight that the Republican party made in Ohio and in the nation against that idea. The Republican party has stood ever since its existence, during the war and since the war, for an honest currency; and the Republican party stands on that platform to-day. The remedy, I insist, Mr. Speaker, for the evils that are now inflicted upon us, is not by the free coinage of silver, but by restoring to this country the general prosperity of the people. If the people are prosperous the Government will be prosperous, because the Government is dependent upon the people, and not the people upon the Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY] said that it is not safe to follow the doctrinaires of this country. I agree with him. I call his attention to the splendid development made in the Southern country since the war, due to a protective tariff. I point him to the example and experience of our people there, and say to him that if we follow along Republican lines, if we are given protection in the South and all over this country, prosperity will return to us and we will hear no more of this cry of the free coinage of silver. The Republican party is not unfriendly to silver. I believe, as the Republican party believes, in coining all the silver that it is safe to coin; all that is consistent with safety to the business interests and the currency of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is well sometimes to appeal to history and to appeal to the experience of this country. Let us examine a little the history of the Democratic party and of the Republican party in the history of this country on this financial question. The last Democratic President before Grover Cleveland was Mr. James Buchanan. We had lived during Mr. Buchanan's Administration under a free-trade tariff, and Mr. Buchanan was inaugurated into office under auspices of general peace and prosperity, strong in the confidence of a united, a triumphant Democracy; possessed of every aid and inducement to an honest, patriotic, brilliant, vigorous, successful administration of the Nation, but he retired from power amid general execration and disgrace, carrying into his retirement the official brand of public condemnation upon his forehead, leaving to the world as the only trophies of his Administration the National Treasury depleted; the country loaded with debt, increased in time of peace; his party disorganized and dismembered, and the perpetuity of the Republic a doubtful and appalling problem.

Why, sir, Mr. Buchanan himself, in the last message he sent to Congress before his retirement from the Presidency, said this:

With unsurpassed plenty in all the products and all the elements of natural wealth, our manufactures are suspended, our public works are retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds are abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers are thrown out of employment and reduced to want. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is in a deplorable condition.

That is a description of the condition at the end of the last Democratic Administration prior to Mr. Cleveland's. That Administration went into power when the country was prosperous, and it left the country, as Mr. Buchanan himself says, with public works retarded, with private enterprises paralyzed and abandoned, with the Treasury depleted and the national credit at a low ebb. That was the condition of the country when Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated in 1861. The Government was without money and without credit; laborers were without employment, and farm products were at their lowest price in the history of the country for many years. What was the remedy that Mr. Lincoln applied? What was the remedy that the Republican party applied? It was the enactment of the Morrill tariff law, which carried this country through a great war and which, with slight modifications, has supplied us with revenue ever since.

After the war the finances of this country were readjusted on a basis honorable to all. Since that time we have paid off more than half the public debt, and have maintained our gold, silver, and paper money on a parity. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic party of late have professed a high appreciation of the greenback currency of the country. That very greenback to which they now profess to be so friendly they originally declared it unconstitutional to issue, and the Republican party was the creator and the defender of the greenback currency, which it made as good as gold.

Now, let us see what was the condition of this country when Mr. Cleveland came into power. The conditions that confronted Mr. Cleveland when he came into power were very like the conditions that prevailed when Mr. Buchanan came into power, and Mr. Cleveland will leave this Government in a worse condition, if possible, than that in which Mr. Buchanan left it. R. G. Dun & Co., in their weekly review of business conditions on the 30th day of December, 1892, said:

The most prosperous year ever known in business closes to-day with strongly favorable indications for the future.

This was at the end of the year 1892, at the close of a series of Republican Administrations of this Government. In December, 1893, when Mr. Cleveland had been in power less than a year, what was the condition of the country? The same authority, R. G. Dun & Co., in their weekly review of December 29, 1893, said.

Starting with the largest trade ever known, mills crowded with work, and all business stimulated by high hopes, the year 1893 has proved, in the sudden shrinkage of values, in commercial disasters, and in the depression of industries, the worst for fifty years. Whether the financial results of the panic of 1837 were relatively more severe the scanty records of that time do not clearly show. The year closes with prices of many products the lowest ever known, with mills and workers seeking in vain for work, and with charity laboring to keep back suffering and starvation in all our cities. All hope the new year may bring brighter days, but the dying year leaves only a dismal record. The reviews of different departments of trade given to-day exhibit a collapse of business which is almost without precedent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we know that instead of there being any improvement since December, 1893, matters have grown worse, until the prices of farm products are now at the lowest point, the laborers of this country are without employment, public works are retarded, private enterprises of all kinds are paralyzed.

Now, what is the remedy proposed by the Republican party on this occasion? The Republican party proposes, when restored to power, to return to a Republican, an American tariff system, such as carried this country through the war, which has enabled us to pay off more than half the public debt and to build up the waste places in this country, giving labor more employment and better wages than it ever had before; and particularly, Mr. Speaker, in my own Southern country we desire to have the benefits of this beneficent system of a protective tariff, and we do not intend to be led astray by this Democratic cry for the free coinage of silver. The Democratic party has undertaken to deceive the people on the tariff question and has declared for free trade, and now when it can deceive the people no longer by crying "free trade" it proposes to cry "free coinage of silver." I say that in my own country, in the South, our people will be found standing for sound money and against the free coinage of silver. We do not desire that the bonanza kings of the West shall feather their pockets at the expense of the people of this country. Give us protection, protection for our iron, our coal, our lumber, and our marble, and we will build up the South more than it has ever been developed in all the years of the past. [Loud applause.]

The Republican party believes in the doctrine taught by Daniel Webster in that magnificent speech in the Senate in 1846, when he said:

Proclaim it everywhere and make it a proverb that where there is work for the hands of men there will be work for their teeth. Where there is employment there will be bread. It is a great blessing to the poor to have cheap food, but greater than that, prior to that, and of still higher value, is the blessing of being able to buy food by honest and respectable employment. Employment feeds and clothes and instructs. Employment gives health, sobriety, and morals. Constant employment and well-paid labor produce, in a country like ours, general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. The advancement of the United States is the world's wonder. The other nations of the earth can not furnish such a splendid exhibition of progress in any age or period.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party will, when returned to power, restore to the country its former prosperity, not by free and unlimited coinage of silver, but by giving the country a larger but safe use of silver, and by the adoption of a thoroughly American protective policy.

In conclusion, I indorse the sentiment of Senator FRYE at a Republican banquet held at Bridgeport, Conn., on the 29th of March of this year, when he said:

Give us Republican rule for a single decade, unlimited, uncrippled power, and we will show the people the beneficence of Republican legislation.

Every man who wants work will have it, and at the wages of the crowning year of Republican rule, 1892. We will place our flag on all the seas of the earth, restore the merchant marine in its place, and will increase our white, strong-armed squadrons so that they may command the respect of all nations. We will annex the Hawaiian Islands, fortify Pearl Harbor, build the Nicaragua Canal, and marry two great oceans. We will show people a foreign policy that is alive in every fiber, and hoist the American flag on whatever island we think best, and no hand shall ever pull it down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that I belong to a class of individuals entertaining views differing in many respects from those entertained by either of the old parties. In the discussion of the question before us I shall endeavor to present the Populists' view of the situation to-day, and what seems to us the proper course for this House to pursue in order to meet the issues of the hour. I shall pursue a different course from a majority of the speakers that have preceded me. I am going to suppose we are all patriotic citizens; that every man within the sound of my voice loves his country; that he has but one object in view, that object being to meet the needs of the hour for the best interests of all classes of our people.

A very pertinent question is, Can that be done? I answer, Yes. You naturally ask, How? I say that we should simply bring to bear the principles of practical common sense, based upon the experience of ages; we should utilize those principles in the financial legislation of the country in this her hour of need.

A few weeks ago we received a message from the President of the United States, informing us of the depletion of the gold reserve. The leading committee of this House hastened to prepare two bills. One of those bills submitted for our consideration provided for an increase of the revenue of the Government; the other provided for the issue of bonds to meet the needs of the Treasury at this particular time. I have felt it my duty to cast a negative vote against each of those bills. Not that I am not willing at all times to vote every dollar that is necessary to meet the actual needs of the Government; but I believe that with a nation as with an individual there are times when retrenchment should be the order of the day. That this was not the proper time to place additional burdens upon our people. To place in the hands of the President or his Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue bonds as provided in the bond bill would enable him to retire the entire amount of greenbacks that have been issued by the Government. But our Republican friends say, "We are opposed to the retirement of the greenbacks; and we have provided that when they are redeemed they shall be kept in the Treasury."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is any difference in the effect upon the interests of the country between the destruction of the greenbacks and their retirement by locking them up in the Treasury and thus taking them out of circulation, I fail to discover it.

The fact is we need more money; we need honest money; we need sufficient money to preserve the equity of contracts and uniformity of prices, money that will meet the demands of the age. Now we are peculiar people. Some say that those who think with me are in favor of going back instead of forward. No, my friends, you are grievously mistaken. Our principles are onward. Our idea is simply this—that an honest man will pay honest debts when he has the ability to do so; that an honest government, by just legislation, as far as lies within its power, will provide the means by which its indebtedness can be paid. Some of my Republican and Democratic friends do not differ from me in this matter; others of each party say: "We want honest money." We say that is just what we want. We say nothing but honest money will satisfy us. You ask me what is "an honest dollar." I answer "an honest dollar" is a dollar of the contract, an appreciated dollar is a dishonest dollar.

Why am I not in favor of the gold standard, you ask. I will answer that cheerfully. First, there is not sufficient gold as the basis upon which the credit of this nation and the commercial nations of the earth can rest. In the second place, if you destroy silver as one of the money metals that have been established in this country, you destroy one-half of the basis of money contracts and thereby destroy the equity of all contracts. If you will consult any of the writers of eminence on this subject, I care not who, you will find that by destroying one-half of the basis you double the debt; but in doubling the debt you double the value of all credit money in the country. Hence we say that by legislation that has been had in the past and by legislation that, I am sorry to say, is liable to prevail in this House, we are about to adopt a system by which the products of human labor will continue to depreciate from time to time.

I have carefully studied the history of the last fifty years of my country. I belong to old Revolutionary stock. In my earliest youth I was baptized in the spirit of love for my country. It was years before I could educate myself far enough away from my prejudices to examine into the conditions and the causes that were at work in this country of ours, that were depreciating on the one hand the labor of the tillers of the soil and other toilers throughout the land, while vastly appreciating the income of another class of our people. In this respect I entertain the same views that Daniel Webster did in his time. I believe that we can not long continue to be a prosperous or a contented and a happy people when the gulf is widening from day to day between the men who create the wealth of the nation and the men who possess it. I have no disposition to antagonize a rich man if he gets his money honestly, any more than I have any other class. I bid him godspeed; but, on the other hand, I say it is our duty in this Hall to create the conditions by which the masses of the people may enjoy the fruits of their labor that it may not be confiscated in the interest of another class of people.

Can that be done? Unhesitatingly I answer, it can. You ask me how? I will tell you with pleasure. Go back with me to 1850. Come with me down along the years that elapsed from 1850 to 1860. During that period the agricultural wealth of this country increased over 50 per cent; from 1860 to 1870 it increased over 60 per cent; but from 1870 to 1890, a period of twenty years, agricultural wealth in the old State of Pennsylvania, the home of my birth, depreciated $121,000,000, while she had an increase in population of nearly 2,000,000, if the reports of the census are worthy of credit. I am a farmer. From 1850 to 1860 we realized in New York City a fraction over $16 a barrel for our pork; and we realized an average of a little over 53 cents a pound for our fine wool. But from 1880 to 1890 we realized a fraction over $13 a barrel for our pork, and a fraction over 33 cents a pound on the average for our fine wool.

I say, then, Mr. Speaker, we must look further for the causes controlling this question. Facts are stubborn things. You want proof, and it is my province and pleasure to give it.

In 1860 we were not in a prosperous condition, as my friend from Tennessee has said. Whether the depression was caused by legislation or otherwise it is not my province to say; but at that particular hour in our history—in 1861—we were brought face to face with the most formidable rebellion of ancient or modern times. Brother unsheathed his sword and went to battle with brother. North and South for the next four years we heard the clashing of arms. What did we do? During that particular time we created a navy, we created an army, we created the means by which they existed. We subdued, and I am proud to say we did subdue, and I believe they are all with me in regard to that, the most powerful uprising in the history of the nations of the world; and we met on the field of battle the most gallant, most fearless soldiers that ever saw service under the flag in the history of the nations of the world. Be that to their credit. I belong to that class who have sheathed the sword and are living to-day, under the providence of Almighty God living, giving thanks for what has been done, and living to make this nation what it should be. [Applause.]

We created, as I have said, an army and a navy, and we fed and clothed them and paid them. We enjoyed at the close of the war, throughout the North, prosperity unparalleled in the history of the country; and I presume there is not a gold bug here or anywhere else who will call that statement into question.

What next? We commenced to build up homes, towns, cities, and railroads without parallel in history. But while doing this we commenced to reduce the volume of the currency. We commenced to disturb the currency of the country, and instead of creating in the minds of men the utmost good faith in our permanent prosperity, we proceeded to tear down and destroy. We commenced using the credit of the nation, the credit of the people. In 1865 we had 520 failures—not a bad showing. In 1870 we had over 3,000. In 1873 we had over 5,000, and then our financiers got together, rubbed their hands, and said, "There is something wrong; we have got to make a marked change. I will tell you the power that has been in our hands will not be retained unless we do." Did they make a proper diagnosis of the case, as they supposed? They did undertake to do it, and then said to the patient, We will dismember one of the limbs in order to effect a cure; we will destroy silver. Most of you are old enough to remember the panic of 1873, which followed soon after the demonetization of silver. You will remember also the report of the Commission of 1876; you remember the remonetization of silver at $2,000,000 a month in 1878, and you may doubtless remember the other fact that with little exception from 1875 to 1895, a period of twenty years, failures have increased at a certain ratio, and to-day there are 300,000 business men in this country who, under the adverse circumstances which surrounded them in that period, have failed and gone out of business. Some one said, "What do you want; what is your remedy? Do you want more money?" Yes, sir; I do. I want more prosperity and less misery. "Are you not in favor of paying an honest debt in honest dollars?" That is exactly what I favor, and when I hear a man say, "I will pay $10,000 that costs as much of the product of my labor and of my brain as the money I borrowed," I say that is the honest dollar he pays, and that there is but one honest dollar in existence, and that is the dollar of the contract.

Then, what would I do? I would adopt this bill now before the House. I would give the coin—the silver coin—the money power that belongs to it. I would coin the silver, every dollar of silver and of gold, and if I had not money enough I would coin greenbacks sufficient to enable every industry in this country to enjoy prosperity. "You would?" Yes. "Well, now, that is very strange, with 4,000,000 of unemployed, as we were told last Congress, in this country." Yes; I would; I would create a condition that every man willing to toil—every man—could enjoy if he desired; that every man who is willing to work could eat the fruits of his labor, and his wife and children have the benefit of proper clothing and comfortable homes—warm houses of their own which they could enjoy.

I have been told recently during the discussion of this question by our friend Mr. WALKER that the farmers were prosperous. I wonder how he would like the Massachusetts manufacturers to enjoy the same kind of prosperity. If so, he is differently constituted from any man I ever saw. He is certainly differently constituted from myself. I would like to see the manufacturers of this land prosper. The manufacturers, however, can never be prosperous unless the farmers of the country are prosperous. The basis of all wealth and of all prosperity rests with the farmers of the world. That is absolutely the basis. Give them prosperity, give them a good market, and what will be the result? It will enhance the value of everything else. They will buy twice the products of the manufacturer, and build up all the other industries of the country. Their looms will start up, and the man who anxiously seeks food and clothing for his family need not go hungry or without a fireside of his own, but there will be something of the same degree of prosperity that we had in 1865.

An eminent writer, in speaking on the subject of the national labor problem, and a nation entering upon a great degree of development, at the same time reducing the volume of money, declared that such a nation commits a heinous crime. That is the substance of the language, although not the exact text of it. Have we done so? We have, undoubtedly, in this country. Who are to be benefited by this process? It is true that our foreign trade amounts to about $2,000,000,000 annually, and that our internal trade amounts to $48,000,000,000, or twenty-four times as much. Shall the interests of our forty-eight billions of internal commerce be sacrificed for that of the two billions of foreign trade? We think not; we think that it is wholly unnecessary and wrong to sacrifice the interests of 95 per cent of our people for the 5 per cent that will be benefited. I want an American policy that will protect the interests of all of our people. I have no sympathy with that policy which would make our toiling people the serfs to England as are the Turks and Egyptians. They have gold monometallism. Contemplate them in all their glory, you who uphold the golden scepter in this House.

There is no nation in history in any period of time that has made the development that we have in the last fifty years, and my Republican friends, with great pride, point to the fact. I acknowledge that we have made wonderful developments, but if you will be equally honest and frank you will acknowledge that you have made some grievous mistakes. You and I both know that crime has increased with a fearful velocity. You and I must confess that failures have increased at a terrible rate. You and I must acknowledge to-day that there is a burden of debt of many billions of dollars resting upon us which, if payment was demanded, we should be unable to meet at this time. Now the question is, What should we do? I am willing to vote for any measure that I believe will bring prosperity to my people and will honestly carry out a contract. I never stop to inquire where a measure has its origin. I ask myself the question, "Is that right? If that principle was carried out and engrafted into law would it accomplish the end for which it was created?" If I find it will it gets my support, I do not care where it comes from. But if, on the other hand, it is destitute of that, then I must be excused for casting my vote against it.

In regard to the tariff bill I could not vote for it because, first, the people are not able to buy the goods at present prices without an increase in tariff duties. In the second place, I believe it was our duty in this hour of trial to retrench, to reduce expenses. In the third place, I will vote for the amended bill as it comes from the Senate, because in that form it is calculated to give us a greater basis upon which the currency of this country will rest. It will give us more money, and, giving us more money, it will produce with us just exactly what it has with other nations in the past. I know the creditor will claim, on the one hand, that he is wronged, but we think that he has no ground for that complaint. We think that he has gained so much in the past that if he lost one-half he would still be the gainer to a very great extent. We believe the ends to be accomplished and the great gains to the whole country, as a country, will vastly compensate him for all, if he should suffer in any respect by this change in legislation.

Then, do you know what we should do? I will with pleasure tell you, because the Populist is never afraid to confess in open court. I should coin every dollar of gold that we could get. That is good money. It is the money of the Constitution. I should coin every dollar of silver that we could get. It is good money. It is the money of the Constitution. I believe in the money of the Constitution. And then, if we had not money sufficient to meet the needs of the hour, I should issue greenbacks or Treasury notes enough, and make them all interchangeable one with another. I say, Mr. Speaker, I would give the people the best money that it is possible for any people to have, and I would start the wheels of industry in all the length and breadth of this land of ours, and I would restore hope and confidence to those who are so greatly discouraged by the conditions now existing.

Mr. MOSES. In regard to the greenbacks, would you make every dollar of greenbacks redeemable in gold or silver?

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. I should not, unless by making them interchangeable. As I said before, I would make them interchangeable one with another.

Mr. MOSES. I have made the claim that the Populist party is not a silver party.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. In that you are vastly mistaken.

Mr. MOSES. I ask my friend because I have more respect for his opinion than that of any man on this floor on his side. I have claimed in the State of Georgia that your party does not believe in either gold or silver, that it is a fiat-money party. Mr. Watson in his book says that this money should be irredeemable, and I now ask on the floor of the House whether I have misrepresented your party or not.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. I will say this, I do not know in just what way the members of that party in Georgia may present their views, but a great many Populists—and possibly those are some of them—have the idea that the very fact that the money receives the stamp of the United States which says that it is one dollar makes it a dollar, and that at the very moment that it has paid a dollar of debt it has been redeemed, and that neither gold nor silver nor greenbacks need any other redemption; that when a dollar has paid a debt it has fulfilled its mission, just as a postage stamp, when it is placed upon a letter and been canceled, has fulfilled its mission in paying the way of the letter to its destination. That is the view that is entertained by a great many of our people. On the other hand, you know, the Good Book says, "By their fruits shall ye know them." Now, I have happened to be a member of this House since 1890, and I say frankly that we are the only party in this House who have been consistent silver men. My brother here will bear me out.

Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia. That is right.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. We believe in the money of the Constitution; and I only wish all my Republican and Democratic friends could say the same. To-day they are a little like King Agrippa when Paul was before him. You know he said, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." And so I wish to God, in the cause of humanity, that you could see this thing in the light of reason. The trouble is that a great many members of this House are hypnotized. You do not see things for yourselves. You see them through the eyes of somebody else. I say, divest yourselves of your prejudices. Look at the lowly farmer or the farmer of wealth. Look at the lowly mechanic or the skilled mechanic. Look at the failures. Look at the bonds and mortgages. Look at the chaos that now exists in our financial centers. Look at the vast accumulation of wealth on one hand, and then look at the demands that come to us from the money centers of this country and of Europe.

Look at the merchant, look at the banker, and see what your duty as citizens is, and you will agree with me that it is your duty as patriots in this particular time in our history to rise above all party considerations in the future, and cast your votes—as I believe you would if you would only look for yourselves in the way that I have suggested—cast your votes for the amended bill as it comes from the Senate. That will give a new inspiration to 60,000,000 of our people. There is a certain class it will hurt; that is unquestionably true, but I say it will benefit nine men to every one it injures, and I do not believe that in the end it will injure any man. Is my time up, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. We have had from time to time our attention called to the fact of the great prosperity that England is enjoying. I will concede without argument that England to-day is in a much more prosperous condition than we are. England is on a gold basis and we are on a silver basis, Mr. Speaker—are we? No, we are on a gold basis, too. England is on a gold basis and we are on a gold basis; England is a creditor nation, and she demands payment of her debts in dear money; we are a debtor nation, and have been foolish enough to yield to the demands of Great Britain and thereby doubled every dollar of indebtedness that we owe to Great Britain at her behest. I, for one, can not give my acquiescence to anything of that kind. I would pay her in the money borrowed. If it was borrowed in gold I would pay it in gold, and if it was borrowed in currency I would pay it in the currency of the country, and she would have to receive that in payment. So that we Populists want it to be distinctly understood that we are in favor of the money of the Constitution in the first place, and in the second place we are in favor of the money that maintains the equity of contracts. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Speaker, I will add but a few words to the discussion that has already consumed so much valuable time in this House.

Soon after the opening of the present session we were called upon by the President to take prompt action for devising ways and means to meet a financial crisis. Not only had the gold reserve been reduced below the mark of safety, but the revenue of the Government had become inadequate to meet its expenses to the amount of more than $40,000,000 annually. This excess of demand above the income of the Government was being taken from the gold reserve. In a word, we were draining the Treasury of its gold at the rate of $40,000,000 each year, and thus the deficiency.

The future of our finances was indeed dark, with no remedy in sight. The President, realizing the danger, appealed to the lawmaking power to bridge over the gulf of bankruptcy toward which the National Treasury was fast drifting. The best financial brains of the majority in this House quickly originated and presented two bills—one an emergency bond bill with a low rate of interest and the other a revenue bill that would at least prevent the balance of trade from counting against us. These two bills, after mature deliberation, were passed by this body, thus fulfilling its obligations as servants of the people in remedying the evil and preventing its recurrence.

Mr. Speaker, I had strong hopes that the Senate would concur in our action. but after waiting a month the bond bill is returned to us with all of its provisions stricken out and a free-coinage measure substituted.

Mr. Speaker, while I am in favor of the largest possible coinage of silver consistent with safety, it must be on a parity with gold and the exchanges of the world.

We have no use for a depreciated currency in this country for the reason that all values are established on a basis of 100 cents to the dollar. Our private, local, State, and national indebtedness has all been incurred on this basis.

The adoption of this substitute would not only mean repudiation, but destruction financially. Its results would be freighted with disaster and ruin to the men who labor, and who are the backbone of the nation's prosperity. Humiliate the masses by a depreciated currency and you lower the standard of civilization.

Our currency should be fixed and stable and of a sufficient quantity for the full transaction of business and elastic enough to protect business interests and the interests of labor in every emergency.

Mr. Speaker, cause and effect are close companions, though often far apart. A robber steals your money, and the effect is you are impoverished.

The adoption of this substitute would have the same effect. The people would receive 50 cents for that which cost them 100 cents. For, Mr. Speaker, 50 cents' worth of silver can not pass current for a dollar without bringing all values to its level. Are we prepared for this? I think not.

This is not a party question. It concerns the welfare of, the honor of, and the integrity of the nation in the discharge of its honest obligations.

I do not believe that the wisdom of this body, fresh from the people as it is, will allow this unwise measure to pass.

Mr. Speaker, in the upbuilding of our industrial system is to be found the solution of the financial problem.

I can not vote for this substitute. It should not pass. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER Mr. Speaker, it is the special duty, it seems to me, of Representatives to approach the discussion of a question like the one before the House with a judicial spirit, rather than that of a special attorney. A special desire should exist to rather learn the truth than defend a case.

Certain things have been established in this connection beyond a doubt. They rest upon no hypothesis nor course of reasoning. They have gone into history, and no attempt is made on the part of any intelligent or fair-minded man to contradict or question them even. It is upon these that we must rely, rather than suppositions, or theories, or hypotheses, or wishes, or ought-to-have-beens, when dealing with so delicate a thing as credit and a matter so comprehensive as to involve every life-insurance policy, every deposit in a bank, every piece of property in the United States, every day's labor, and thus materially affect every man, woman, and child in the land.

Let us see, then, how many of these great milestones there are along the line of the financial experience of the United States. Let us stop theorizing and seek truths or facts without attempting to explain them away, until, at least, we have completed the line of investigation and are certain of our steps and can measure the consequences.

In the first place, it is a historical fact, established beyond question, that at the time the investigation was made for the purpose of establishing the ratio between gold and silver, in 1792, Alexander Hamilton, one of the most thorough and discriminating scholars the world has produced, found that the nearest approximate value of the two metals at that time was 15 to 1. It was established beyond doubt that owing to the slight difference of value gold disappeared from circulation.

Second. It is well known to everyone that in 1834, owing to the fact that gold had disappeared, another investigation took place and the ratio of 16 to 1 was established. It turned out that this ratio favored gold sufficiently to make silver a commodity, which fact led to the gradual disappearance of silver from circulation. So clearly was this established, and so certainly was all of our silver disappearing, being bought up and shipped out of the country because worth more than its face value, that the Government in 1853 reduced the coin value of our subsidiary coins for the purpose of insuring their circulation, and the plan was successful. The disappearance of gold in the first instance and of silver in the second disclosed no new truth, but only added our own experience to a well-established principle that the poorer always drives out the better money.

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE], that nothing is more conducive to a full and satisfactory understanding of any question than a settlement of terms; indeed, that it is absolutely necessary for an intelligent discussion of any proposition. His definition of bimetallism was that—

Bimetallism is a monetary system where the mints are open to gold and silver on equal terms, at a fixed ratio, and where both have the same debt-paying power; the debtor having the option of the kind of money he shall pay.

"Bimetallism" is a new word, and so new as not to be found in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary of 1888.

It is interesting to observe, however, that the definition of bimetallism found in the Century Dictionary, now the leading authority on such subjects, is utterly at variance with the definition adopted by the gentleman from Minnesota, and is as follows:

Bimetallic.—This word and its derivatives are of recent origin, M. Cernuschi having been the first to use "bimetallique" in 1869 and "bimetallic" in 1876. Of or pertaining to two metals; specifically, pertaining to the use of a double metallic standard in currency.

Bimetallism.—Bimetallism pertains to the use of two metals as money at relative values set by legislative enactment: the union of two metals in circulation as money at a fixed rate. Specifically, that system of coinage which recognizes both coins of silver and coins of gold as legal tender to any amount, or the concurrent use of coins of two metals as a circulating medium at a fixed relative value.

From this it is apparent that there are two distinct definitions of bimetallism. The theoretical bimetallism opens the mints for the two metals, the dearer one never coining and the poorer one only circulating, while practical bimetallism secures the circulation of the two metals side by side, the dearer one carrying a margin of credit in the poorer one and the country having the benefit of both as money.

If there is any such confusion in the public mind as these two definitions would naturally breed, it is high time that the Republican party declared itself emphatically in favor of that bimetallism that actually bimetallizes both gold and silver. A bimetallism that does not bimetallize the two metals, but with absolute certainty monometallizes the cheaper metal and always drives out the better, is, in very truth, monomaniacal bimetallic monometallism—an intoxication with a theory.

It reminds me of the man who, in his trip around the world, had brought home the one bird of all others that filled the air with enchanting song. He waited two long years for the sweet warble of its most promising throat. One day, looking at its beautiful plumage with a friend, he remarked that he had at great expense and much pains brought this wonderful singing bird from the very interior of China, but he had a most striking peculiarity as a songster, and that is: "The damn thing don't sing." Now, the Republican party wants a bimetallism that bimetallizes both gold and silver. Let us here and now declare that we are in favor of the practical as against the theoretical, upon the same ground that we are in favor of protection as against free trade. Let us declare that we are in favor of that metal as a basis of our business transactions that is the least variable in value, and as a result of experience has been adopted by all the great commercial nations of the earth.

The gentleman from Minnesota, my friend, Mr. TOWNE, as a specimen of silver logic, declared that if a horse had sold for $100 in gold in 1890 and that he could obtain but $50 in gold for it to-day, it was just as proper to say that the gold had risen 100 per cent as to say that the price of the horse had fallen 50 per cent. And he makes this statement when every man, woman, and child from the Atlantic to the Pacific knows that the horse is not actually worth more than one-half as much in the market because of the bicycle, the cable car, and the use of electricity, while the hundred dollars in gold will buy practically the same amount of everything that the average man wants to eat, wear, or use that it did in 1890.

Third. It is a fact that in 1873, under the operation of this same law of the poorer money driving out the better, paper had driven out both gold and silver, and there was not a dollar of either to be found in circulation. Therefore, it is not true, as stated by one gentleman, that by demonetizing silver a double burden was thrown upon gold and thereby its value doubled. For how can you remove the burden from a horse when there is no horse in existence? Nor was its value affected in the slightest degree, for neither gold nor silver was doing any commercial work whatever, the whole of our money, every dollar of it, resting upon the credit of our country. It will be well to observe in passing that since silver was worth 104, there was no possible reason for demonetizing it, as the whole history of the country had shown that its price of 104 literally and absolutely removed it from circulation. Owing to these two facts, then—first, that neither gold nor silver was doing any money work; second, that silver was worth 104 and would not have been in circulation even if we had not demonetized it—it is absolutely true that no act of the Government did in any way affect silver at that time.

Fourth. The next great fact that is established beyond question, and about which there is no possible doubt, is that, owing to the decreasing value of silver, which in 1878 had fallen to 89 cents, the mine owners wanted the United States to again become a buyer, and the result was the passage of the Bland-Allison Act. By this act the Government, from 1878 to 1890, purchased 288,474,639.04 ounces, costing the Government $305,229,834.38, or an average of $23,479,218.03 per annum, about one-half the product. The bullion value of the silver dollar in 1878 was, as stated, 89 cents, from which price there was a constant depreciation until it had reached 74 cents in 1890.

Upon the passage of the Sherman Act, which consumed for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893 two-thirds of the product, it took an upward start, and in 1891 ran up to 92 cents, and then down to 74 cents, averaging 81 cents. From that date down to this year it has continued to fall, reaching the low price of 49 cents. Under the Sherman Act it will be observed that the Government purchased for the three years 1891, 1892, and 1893 a total of 156,757,023.75 ounces, at a cost of $147,215,480.93, or an average of $49,071,826.97. By referring to the table of production it will be observed that the amount of silver produced from 1878 to 1890 was $660,250,000, or an average of $50,788,923, and for the years 1891, 1892, and 1893, $235,094,000, or an average of $78,364,667, and, strange as it may seem, though we had largely increased the relative amount consumed of the amount produced, the price continued to fall.

Fifth. It is a fact about which there is no question that the Government did resume specie payments January 1, 1879, and that the Government has maintained a gold standard from that date up to the present time. Now, it has been shown that if the two metals are both entitled to free coinage without making one of the metals carry a margin of credit in the other, as has been done in France and in this country since 1878, one of the metals, the dearer one, will at once disappear from circulation and become a mere commodity, and will furnish a basis for speculation and unsettle the value of the money of the country.

In this connection it is urged by the advocates of silver that gold has appreciated so much that it is a very great injustice to the debtor class of the country to have to pay their obligations in gold. This declaration is not a fact, but a mere assumption; nay, more, as investigation proves, absolutely untrue, contravening the conclusions of the Senate committee report, which proves just the reverse.

To give color to this assumption an attempt is made on the part of the advocates of silver to prove that gold has appreciated in value by comparing it with one or two or possibly three commodities, more particularly cotton and wheat, the observation having been made that there was a striking coincidence in the rise and fall of these two great staples and silver. The advocates of silver were wont to say that they never had varied in any considerable degree. This declaration came very much nearer being true one year ago than now; for, within the past twelve months, although silver has remained practically stationary, the value of cotton has increased 50 per cent at times, and wheat has made a similar gain, so that the charm that this declaration had for certain wheat growers and certain cotton growers has been broken, and the assumption founded upon a mere coincidence has been shown to be a shallow fallacy. This fallacy was also exposed by the fact that when compared with other great staples like corn and oats there did not seem to be the slightest resemblance in the movements, proving that there was no connection between cotton and wheat and silver except the mere accident of coincidence during a certain length of time. But there is one fact still remaining that more than any other, indeed, than all others combined, ought to satisfy all the people of this country, but more particularly the laboring classes, and that is this: That while the silver dollar was constantly falling, going from a value of 104 cents in 1873 down to 64.2 cents in 1892, and still lower to 45.7 cents in 1894, the wages of the laboring masses of our people increased from a standard of $1.47 in gold in 1878 to $1.68 in gold in 1891. Certainly American labor can not afford to change its gold wages for silver wages. It is absolutely certain, therefore, that gold has depreciated instead of appreciating.

By the Senate committee report, known as the Aldrich report, it was demonstrated that up to 1891, the last year recorded in the table, wages measured in gold had nearly doubled since 1850, had more than doubled since 1840, and had increased 14 per cent since 1873. It was also shown that the cost of the articles used by the average laboring man for food and clothing had depreciated from 1873 to 1891 10 per cent, while the fall of prices in the same articles from 1840 to 1891 was 3 per cent.

Now take, if you please, the wages of a laboring man in 1840 as $1, and assume that it was consumed for the necessaries of life, food and clothing, and the same man in 1891 would have received $2.04 for his wages and yet have bought these same articles of food and clothing for 97 cents, leaving him a clear gain of $1.07 as against his day's labor in 1840. Again, if in 1873 this same man had received wages in greenbacks equivalent to $2 in gold for a day's labor, he would have received in 1891 $2.28 in gold for his labor, and would have purchased food and clothing at a gain of 20 cents a day, giving him a net profit in 1891 on a day's labor of 48 cents against his day's labor in 1873.

From this it is clearly seen that gold has not appreciated, but that it to-day takes less labor to produce one dollar in gold than it did in 1873. Therefore, it is established beyond question that no possible injustice can be done to any man by the maintenance of the gold standard, although it may be true that there may have been such changes in some line of employment as to make it harder for a man to make a living than then, because there is not the same demand for what he produces; but the average demand for all labor, which is the best measure of value, shows that there has been a very great appreciation of labor and a corresponding depreciation of gold. This brings us to the consideration of the two distinct propositions of the advocates of silver.

First. There is the silver advocate who believes in free coinage 16 to 1, and asks us to place him or silver where it was in 1873. Mark this, he does not propose to put silver where it was in 1873 in point of value, nor does he propose to be as honest as Alexander Hamilton was in 1792, nor as old General Jackson was in 1834, when they studiously investigated the question for the purpose of determining how much each dollar should contain, in order that they might be as nearly equal in value as possible. He does not propose to make the dollar 32 to 1, but under conditions utterly different, after all the great commercial nations of the earth have discarded it, and when silver is worth just one-half what it was then, he proposes that the Government shall put silver back where it was in 1873. Talk about the dishonesty of bull and bear movements in the New York Stock Exchange. Never in the history of the world was there such a gigantic scheme as this bill proposes, nor was there ever so little reason or justification of hope for success as in this one. The chivalrous feats of Vanderbilt and Gould pale before it in magnitude and rashness. There is $4,070,500,000 silver money in the world, and they propose to enter upon a bull movement to make it worth $8,141,000,000. Nay, more, to double the value of all the silver in the world, about $8,000,000,000, making it worth $16,000,000,000, a slight gain of 8,000,000,000 dollars. It takes a silverized fancy to even dream of such a transformation.

I have wondered whether the silver advocates, who all admit that we would certainly go to a silver basis, have counted the cost of this measure.

Have they paused to contemplate that we are dealing with deposits in loan and trust companies amounting to $471,298,816, worth their face in gold; that we are dealing with commercial money of all the farmers and merchants in the United States now deposited in the national and State banks, amounting to $2,359,761,015, now worth their face in gold; that we are dealing with the savings of the great masses of our people now deposited in the savings banks of this country, amounting to $1,747,961,280, all worth their face in gold; that we are dealing with life-insurance policies belonging to the people, amounting to more than $1,200,000,000, all worth their face in gold; that we are dealing with the entire product of the labor of the American people, representing in concrete form the result of their daily toil, every year worth more than $12,000,000,000 in gold; that we are dealing with every dollar of property in the United States, from the little home of the prudent mechanic to the vast railroad interest that ties the Atlantic to the Pacific with its thongs of steel, amounting in gold value to more than $65,000,000,000; that we are dealing with vast exchanges of our commerce, involving every transaction, from the wages of a day laborer to the bank settlements between financial institutions of our great clearing-house centers, which amounted in gold value in 1892 to $60,883,572,438?

Take this step of 16 to 1 and we can not escape a most disastrous shrinkage in our circulating medium, as all must admit after a careful investigation.

The amount of money in circulation February 6, 1896, and the respective kinds were as follows:

Gold.
Coin	$499,262,686
Certificates	49,847,849
Total	549,110,535
Silver.
Dollars	56,629,678
Subsidiary	64,387,335
Certificates	331,614,339
Treasury notes	110,221,183
Total	562,852,335
Paper money.
Greenbacks	245,745,840
Current certificates	28,925,000
United States national-bank notes	203,086,897

or a total of $1,589,719,607 in the hands of the people and in the banks of the country.

Pass this law at the behest of the men who are claiming to try to give the people more money, and what will happen? Gold to the amount of $549,109,535 will cease to circulate as money, and we will then have among our people and in the banks, as money to do our commercial work with, but $1,040,610,072, silver and paper. Again, if this bull movement should fail to raise the price of the silver dollar above 50 cents, where it now is and where it is in Mexico and all over the world in silver-standard countries, the commercial value or working power of your $562,852,335 of silver money would be cut in two or reduced one-half, and your silver money with doubled prices would only be equal in power to effect exchanges of property to one-half what it is to-day, or $281,426,167.50. So that you can add the other half, or $281,426,167.50, to the gold already withdrawn, making a total shrinkage of $830,535,702.50. But this is not all. Your paper money has also gone to a silver basis and you must cut that in two, leaving you $238,878,868.50 of working power as compared with that money to-day, for it is equal to gold and doing the work of gold in the commerce of the country. Add, then, if you please, this shrinkage to that already suffered, and you have a total shrinkage in the working power of the money now circulating of $1,069,414,560, or two-thirds of all the working power of the money in circulation to-day has been dissipated by this mad struggle for money you do not need.

But we are promptly informed by the silver advocates that they propose to fill this awful gap, this frightful vacuum, with silver.

Silver from where? And how? And when? At the present value of silver it would take the United States alone, at the present rate of production, fifteen years to supply the economic or purchasing power we now have in our money; and yet we have too little to suit these same advocates. But suppose you could gather it from the four corners of the earth, what could you do with it? The bill which has come here from the Senate only provides that you may issue certificates after the silver is coined. Has it ever occurred to any one of these gentlemen advocating this measure to ask the Director of the Mint how much we can coin each year? I hold a letter in my hand signed by Mr. Preston, the Director of the Mint, which reads as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your letter of current date, I estimate the capacity of the mints for coining silver dollars at about $40,000,000 per annum, which, by working overtime, would admit of the necessary gold and subsidiary silver coinage being executed.

Respectfully, yours, R. E. PRESTON.

Hon. CHARLES N. FOWLER,
House of Representatives.

From this it is clear that while it would take the United States fifteen years to produce enough silver at present values to fill the bottomless pit, it would take the United States mints, run at their full capacity, twenty-five years to turn it out even if they had it. Oh, but, as one of the silver advocates said to me the other night, "We will have to issue paper money, and then in the course of time redeem it." What a picture this is to contemplate. Surprised at the possibility of such a condition of things, the ever fertile, imaginative, theoretical advocate of free and unlimited coinage protests that silver would rise. Rise! How do you know it would rise? If at all, how much will it rise? Will you stake your own fortune upon your guess when every man around you sets a different figure to which it may rise? No, gentlemen, we have no right to speculate and gamble with sixty thousand millions of property, which ought to have and would have been seventy thousand millions but for the maladministration of the Government during the past three years. Like prudent men let us figure all the chances against us in a matter of such moment, for the imagination in its dizziest flights can not paint the havoc and ruin that this step in the dark will bring to every home, rich and poor alike.

Now, as has been pointed out, there is a true and actual bimetallism, a bimetallism wherein the stronger, most valuable, and most invariable metal carries a margin of credit in the less valuable metal. Such is the system existing in this country and France to-day. One of the gentlemen discussing this question said that he would be satisfied if we had such bimetallism as they had in France, and therefore was in favor of this Senate measure and its operation until the amount of silver coined in this country should be equal to the amount now in use in France. He evidently thought this could be done by issuing silver without reference to the necessary protection of a gold reserve to insure true bimetallism. The gentleman seems to forget that the Bank of France holds over $404,700,000 of gold and only $250,160,000 of silver, and has but one hundred millions of uncovered paper money. If the proposition of this gentleman was comprehensive in itself and provided for the requisite reserve, we might possibly coin more silver.

Indeed, I am of the opinion that if the United States Government had begun in 1879 and added to the gold reserve one-third of the amount of the depreciation of the silver dollars as fast as the depreciation became evident, and after the passage of the Sherman Act in 1891 had added the same proportion of gold for the protection of these outstanding demand obligations, as we already had for the protection of greenbacks, we might have been coining silver to-day. That is to say, if the United States Government had a gold reserve to-day, or should have gradually accumulated a reserve as its demand obligations increased, amounting in 1893 to about $300,000,000, no question would have been raised with regard to the credit of the country, and the banks would have continued to furnish the gold for export, and there would have been no sale of bonds except the $133,000,000 to cover the deficit and pay the current expenses of the Government. The two hundred and seventy-five millions of gold that has gone into the Treasury has not been to protect the gold, but to protect the credit and replace the gold that had been there to protect the credit.

The second proposition is that we must have more redemption money. But does the country need more redemption money? There is more money in this country to-day than is in use or necessary to transact its present business. Gentlemen upon this floor and many people in different parts of the country mistake their want of more wealth-bringing income for a want of more money. I do not mean to say that under present conditions, when doubts hang thick and black over every enterprise because there is no adequate protection to American labor and American capital, anyone will take a venture in business nor that property can be sold for what it would reasonably be worth in prosperous times. But that is not a misfortune of the money condition as to quantity, but as to quality and the lack of confidence. If the United States should offer to and does refund all her obligations, making them payable in gold, this protracted agony would soon be over.

There is no doubt that our monetary system lacks facility and elasticity, and that we ought to have a system that is more particularly adapted to our conditions than the present one seems to be. We should have a system that, while the values are measured in gold, would incorporate the use of as large an amount of silver as business requires and credit would permit, and also a circulation based upon the property of the country, issued where and when needed to handle and remove the crops in the various localities—the cotton in the South, the wheat in the Northwest, the cattle, hogs, and varied products of the West and Southwest. The circulation should expand and contract as the circumstances require, every dollar of our money as good as every other dollar, and our best dollar as good as the best dollar in the world, and the credit of our nation higher than that of any other nation in the world.

It has been urged here upon this floor by certain gentlemen, and this seems to be a stock argument of the silver advocates, that the amount of standard money determines the price. If this were true in France, with her $34.39 per capita metal money, wages and the cost of living would be higher than in Great Britain, with only $17.06 per capita, but as a matter of fact they are lower, and in the United States, with her $18.17 per capita metal money, our wages in gold are 100 per cent more or double what they are in France and living under the same conditions, but slightly higher, possibly 25 per cent. The following table, showing the weekly wages and cost of living in the respective countries, is taken from Mulhall, the great English statistician:

	Mexico.	France.	England.	United States.
Wages	No record.	$5.25	$7.75	$12.00
Living	No record.	3.00	3.50	4.00
Net profit		2.25	4.25	8.00

It is further clearly established that the money in circulation has nothing to do with the price of articles or the wages of a country by the fact that from 1860 down to this hour there never has been a time when the per capita circulation of this country was much, if any, greater than it is now, and at one time it was as low as $10, and yet at no time during this whole period have prices been as low as they are to-day. The great advantages our people have over the laboring masses of Great Britain and France will enable everyone to discover how fallacious this claim is when the following figures are considered. We must not forget, in this connection, that the eternal song of the silver knight is that free coinage gives a larger per capita circulation. It will be observed that Mexico with but $4.71 is the only free-coinage country included in this table and has but $1 to England's $4; $1 to the United States $5.50, and $1 to France's $8, the very reverse of what is claimed:

	Mexico.	France.	England.	United States.
Gold	*$0.41	$21.54	$14.18	$9.09
Silver	4.1⅛	12.85	2.88	9.08
Paper	.17	2.31	2.92	6.90
Total	4.71	36.70	19.98	25.07

* Estimated.

The gentleman from California, my friend Mr. JOHNSON, cried out in his anguish yesterday:

Why don't you do something for silver?

It was an appeal that might be made to any one of us as men to help a beggar, but we are not here to help either cotton, or corn, or wheat, or silver, or any other interest, unless in helping the United States they happen to be favorably affected.

To ask this House to take even the silver of the United States, to say nothing of that of the world, which is worth but 50 cents on the dollar, and make it worth 100 cents simply for the sake of doing something for silver, is no more reasonable than to ask the United States to buy all the cotton up at 6 cents per pound and compel the people to take it at 12 because it was 12 in 1873; no more reasonable than to compel the United States, by legislation, to buy up all the wheat at 50 cents per bushel and sell it to the people at $1 per bushel because it was $1 a bushel in 1873; no more reasonable than to compel the United States to buy up all the horses and mules at $50 a head and force the people to purchase them at $100 per head because horseflesh was worth that price before the day of bicycles, cable cars, and electricity. Our duty is to the people, the whole people, and not to some one locality or some one interest, especially when such interest is so insignificant as silver compared with the other vast interests of our country.

Our annual silver product is worth but one-half of 1 per cent of all our other products; is equal to but 16 per cent of our wheat, 21 per cent of our cotton, 6 per cent of our corn, 5 per cent of our pork and beef.

We are not here to check inventions, paralyze improvements, and stop the progress of civilization.

Gold is the natural selection of modern commerce and only another illustration of that great natural law, "the survival of the fittest," and no legislation can change its ultimate place as the standard money of the world and the measure by which all values shall be determined.

We want as good money as any nation in the world. We want that of the highest standard and of the best quality; for we are the first nation in the world and must be up to date in the progress of the world. We want a basis of exchange that will leave no opportunity for bankers to squeeze the merchants out of 5 per cent on the pretense of doubtful money, or the cost of converting it into exchange. We want a basis that will leave no opportunity for merchants to squeeze 20 or 25 per cent out of laboring men under the same pretense. We want a money so good that not one millionth part of a cent can be deducted from the wages of the laborer because of a doubt of its goodness.

It has been established beyond question that poor or fluctuating money has always resulted in great profit to the banker and a corresponding loss to the people, and the nearer you get to the laboring classes and the lower every form of labor the greater is the loss to the laborer.

When gold payments were suspended by France in the years 1871, 1872, and 1873 the dividends of the Bank of France were 20 per cent for the second half of 1871, 32 per cent for 1872, and 35 per cent for 1873, proving again the fact that had been established times without number that all of the loss growing out of poor money, or any money poorer than the best, is always borne by the people. During that long period of suspension of specie payments from 1797 to 1821 by the Bank of England it was but dividends and bonuses taken out of the trades people and laboring classes of Great Britain.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, our most subtle and profound writer on economics, says that the cost of the suspension of specie payments in the United States in 1862, and the use of greenbacks up to the time of resumption in 1879, cost the great mass of the people an incalculable amount, although bankers thrived as never before or since in this country.

Every imaginable doubt arising along the line of the development of the untouched raw material to the most elaborate productions are capitalized by the merchant and banker and deducted from the wages of the toilers, and this is necessarily so, because any other course would lead to certain ruin and a still greater calamity to the laborers themselves. Bad and doubtful money would furnish more opportunity and occasion for such deductions than any other one cause, and therefore no member of society is so deeply interested in the absolutely safe and invariable dollar as the day laborer.

Again, as I understand the silver advocates upon this floor, the reason they urge above all others is that they want to increase prices and stimulate trade.

That being so, the one Englishman to whom you refer and upon whom you rely for popular and political support, A. J. Balfour, is utterly at variance with you. In his Mansion House speech, now so famous, delivered August 3, 1893, he used this language:

> I have heard it stated by those who object to the views which I shall venture to defend before you to-day that all persons who advocate a double standard are desirous of inflating the currency, and thereby of artificially raising prices. Now, I am not concerned to deny that possibly in the Western States of America there may be a body of opinion of some importance on which this criticism might truly be passed. I speak with no authority on this point, and I may be quite wrong, but from such literature as I have been able to peruse, I think it possible that the inconvertible currency which at one time existed in America has left behind it in the West certain traditions and sympathies in favor of what I believe they call "soft money," which are open to the objection that those who hold them really desire not to keep the standard of values stable, but to lower it in favor of the debtor as against the creditor. But whether this be or be not true of America, I most emphatically assert that it is not true of any body of opinion in this country. Nobody I know of, no responsible person whom I have ever met or ever heard of, desires artificially to inflate the currency with the view of stimulating trade, or relieving debtors, or of robbing creditors.

Do you say prices should increase? Prices of what? There is but one thing that should increase in price in this country and all over the world, and that is labor. I have a hope that labor will never get less, but always be getting more and more, until the perfect equation is found and reached between labor and capital. On the other hand, I hope that everything that the average American needs to eat or wear, or use for his comfort, and the house in which he lives, or ought to live, shall grow cheaper and cheaper, so long as it does not come out of labor to the extent of a farthing, until the great mass of the people of this country can enjoy their existence as human beings ought to in the twentieth century in this great Republic of ours. We want cheaper and cheaper necessaries of life, but higher and higher wages and earnings for the farmers, mechanics, and every other conceivable producer in the land.

The gentleman from Arkansas thought the other day that he was making an argument when he informed the House that out of 1,600,000,000 people in the world two-thirds of them used silver alone. I presume he would have spoken as much of the truth if he had said one-third of them did not use any money at all that was recognized by any of the civilized nations, even the silver-using people.

Considering the low state of civilization in much of the world and the absence of similar conditions in different parts of the world, it would have been just as pertinent for him to have remarked that of human beings, cattle, and horses in the United States two-thirds of them eat hay, and therefore we should all eat hay. It is apparent that the statement means absolutely nothing unless regard be had for the conditions in which human beings live. The truth is that from a state of barter to the use of some kind of metal—to the use of gold and silver—civilization has moved us along to the use of gold as a basis of value and an almost incalculable amount of business purely upon credit. There has been a gradual, constant, invariable movement in this direction on the part of the different nations of the earth, just in proportion as they have become civilized and have participated and become factors in the commercial world.

This is clearly demonstrated by the fact that the one nation, Great Britain, whose commerce reaches into every bay and crosses every lake, and covers every sea around the entire globe, and whose capital and commercial center is the commercial center of the entire world, does not recognize silver in the slightest degree, except as subsidiary coin. Germany, too, as soon as she became a great power, feeling the necessity of adopting the same standard if she would participate in the commerce of the world successfully, saw that she must have that standard that the laws of international trade had inexorably demanded. France, too, claimed by some to sustain a higher civilization than any other country in the world, was driven to the same standard to escape being entirely eliminated from the commerce of the world. And so it will be with each succeeding nation as it comes to take an active part in the interchange of products, for they will learn by sad experience, if the people are civilized like our own and not peons, the frightful expense of doing business on a different basis is borne by them alone. Then, are we to disregard all that has been achieved in the world in this particular line of development when we discover all the more civilized nations have adopted gold as a standard? Does the ambitious young man who enters business emulate the methods and habits of that man in the community who possesses the least degree of intelligence and wrestles with necessity and grovels in poverty, or does he not rather emulate and imitate the most skilled mechanic, the most thriving merchant, the most successful banker?

It is admitted as a fact by all parties that the nations that have a silver standard sustain the lowest forms of civilization, and that there are distinctly two classes—the wealthy, or nabobs, and the miserable peons, constituting the great mass of the people.

It is also a fact that all of the civilized nations of the earth are gold-standard countries, and while there are some countries that are not in the higher plane of civilization, those exceptions only prove the rule and show that wherever the light of civilization is breaking, there just as certainly you find a tendency to the gold standard.

It should be observed in this connection that in the two most distinctively gold-standard countries, the United States and Great Britain, wages and farm products are higher than anywhere else in the world, while in the distinctively silver-using countries—Mexico, China, and Japan—farm products are lower and labor cheaper than anywhere else in the world.

Finally, our friends affect great alarm at what may happen in the so-called scramble for gold, and warn us that there is not gold enough to do what the commercial world is actually doing, and point to our financial gyrations and contortions as if that proved anything. Does England experience any difficulty? Does Germany experience any difficulty? Does France experience any difficulty? No. Nor would we if we placed ourselves in an unequivocal position of good faith and honesty in black and white, instead of trying to maintain a position that will enable us at some time in the future to both lie and steal. For that disgraceful, but apparently to us, as a government, inestimable privilege, we have paid during the past eighteen months about $200,000,000, and lost through the withdrawal of confidence and capital probably ten times that amount, and possibly fifty times. God only knows what stagnation and destruction we have suffered because we have not simply said as a nation, We are and are going to be absolutely honest and keep good faith with all the world, and acted accordingly. Can we afford to make the promise in the midst of the supposed scramble? There is no scramble, and we can always afford to be honest; we can not afford to be anything else.

But what about the supply of gold? All the leading nations of Europe, England, France, and Germany have had no difficulty in keeping all they needed or wanted. Russia, in the meantime, has increased her accumulation of $119,000,000 in 1872 to $175,000,000 in 1887; to $301,000,000 in 1894, and now holds $400,000,000 ready to plant herself upon the gold standard.

The accumulation in our own country is equally significant. To the $213,199,977 we held in 1878 we added enough to make it $443,342,011 in 1881, and June 30, 1895, held $636,229,825. Now, what of the future? Let the most distinguished French political economist of to-day, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, tell us. In the Forum, December, 1895, page 397, he says:

The hesitation shown by so rich a country as the United States to adopt the single gold standard and reduce silver to the rank of subordinate or subsidiary coin is most surprising to Europeans. * * *

The lamentations of MM. Cernuschi and Laveleye, and numerous others less known, did, however, make some impressions upon numerous people. Certain statisticians admitted—erroneously, I think—an appreciation of gold, and in part attributed to it the fall in prices. Even Mr. Giffen, the zealous statistician of the British Board of Trade, adopted this opinion to a certain extent. To-day it has lost all value. The event confirming my predictions, which, however, were easily framed, has shown that the colonization of little-explored countries leads to the discovery of very productive gold mines. Since 1888 the production of gold has advanced considerably. In 1894 it exceeded 800,000,000 francs ($160,000,000), in place of the average product of 500,000,000 francs ($100,000,000) from 1881 to 1883. This production leaves far behind the average of the great auriferous period of 1850 to 1870. A new age of gold is opening, which will strikingly eclipse that which followed the Californian and Australian discoveries in 1850.

The production of gold is increasing in all countries—in the United States, Australia, and Russia; and it tends to become prodigious in South Africa. An able English banker of high repute, Sir Edgar Vincent, returned a few weeks since from the Transvaal and gave it as his opinion that that country contained 25,000,000,000 francs ($5,000,000,000) in gold, to be extracted in twenty years. In 1895 the product of the Transvaal alone will probably reach 250,000,000 francs ($50,000,000), and will probably reach 500,000,000 francs ($100,000,000) in four or five years, if not sooner. In a few years South Africa will produce as much gold as was produced in the entire world in 1883 or 1884. In the meanwhile the old auriferous countries, very far from being exhausted, are augmenting their production and reveal new deposits to prospectors. It is probable that Siberia will in its turn come upon the scene as a great gold-bearing country, when the transsiberian railway shall have been completed, as it will be in a few years.

If we reflect that from 1492 (the year of the discovery of America) to 1893, four centuries, the production of gold, according to the most trustworthy statistics, was only 43,000,000,000 francs ($8,600,000,000), and that the Transvaal alone is presumed to be capable of producing in twenty years 25,000,000,000 francs ($5,000,000,000), we shall understand how little question there can be—by the end of this century or the first quarter of the next, at the farthest—of the scarcity of gold, of the scramble for gold, of the appreciation of gold, and all the other formula that swarmed as scarecrows through the writings of the bimetallists from 1880 to about 1890. The situation is completely reversed. Within two or three years the world will yield more than 1,000,000,000 francs in gold, probably even 1,200,000,000 francs ($200,000,000 to $240,000,000) annually, and this will continue for twenty-five or thirty years, if not for fifty or more.

At the present time the total quantity of gold used in the entire world as money amounts to only $4,086,800,000. If the present annual output of gold, now exceeding $200,000,000, continues for the next twenty years, we will more than produce the amount now used as money. And in the next forty years, upon the same average, the world will produce more gold than it did from 1492 to 1893, a period of four hundred years.

This vast annual product of gold, now overleaping the two-hundred-million mark and reaching up to $300,000,000 per annum, is but the counterpart of that revolution in the relations of the great commercial nations of the earth, and the evolution in production and the distribution of all those things that man now consumes.

The last, the remotest, possible doubt with regard to the basis of value must now be removed, for the entire world is fast coming to be but one single neighborhood, the greater portion of it, commercially speaking, being more conveniently located than were New York, Boston, and Philadelphia fifty years ago. The merchant of New York, Chicago, or San Francisco within the business hours of a single day buys and sells goods in London, Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Constantinople, and the Orient.

The annual exports of domestic products of the United States, Great Britain, Ireland, Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, and France amount to $4,000,000,000, and possibly every dollar of it is by balancing credits, and the margin of profits narrow, especially if the measure of value is certain and stable.

Mr. Edward Atkinson has made the following estimate of the productions of the various countries:

United States: Population approximately 70,000,000—producing within its own area an excess of food, fuel, timber, ores, and fibers—annual product computed at $225 per head	$15,750,000,000
Great Britain and Ireland: Population approximately 40,000,000—deficient within its own area in food, ores, and fibers—annual product computed at $170 per head	6,800,000,000
	22,550,000,000
Germany, Belgium, and the Netherlands: Population approximately 64,000,000—food barely adequate, often deficient; also deficient in fuel, timber, and fibers—annual product computed at $125 per head	8,000,000,000
France: Population approximately 40,000,000—deficient in fuel, ores, and fibers; rich in agriculture—annual product computed at $150 per head	6,000,000,000
Total production, in round figures	36,550,000,000
These are approximate estimates only, which may serve to give a slight comprehension of the problem.
Let it be assumed that one-fourth of this product is consumed where it is produced, without purchase or sale, and therefore without the use of money, say	9,550,000,000
Remainder	27,000,000,000

He significantly remarks that without doubt "in the transformation of the ores into mechanism and tools, of the timber into buildings, furniture, etc., of the grain into bread, dairy products, and meats, and of the fibers into clothing, not less than three times this vast sum of $27,000,000,000, or the incomprehensible amount of $71,000,000,000" of property has passed from man to man. Now, the one thing above all others combined that will insure to labor its full share is an invariable and unquestioned basis of value. Throw into this vast transaction the doubt of 10 per cent and the producers will be deprived of $4,100,000,000, which will be distributed among the middlemen, merchants, and bankers.

The advance in electricity, the telephone, and all material things has been no more phenomenal than the new order of things in the world of commerce. Shall we banish steam, electricity, and the telephone, returning to the primitive sailing vessels, stagecoaches, tram cars, and the horseback postmen; or shall we sweep on into the twentieth century holding fast to all we have gained and confident that the achievements of the coming century have hardly been foreshadowed in the nineteenth?

Our progress will certainly be along material lines conserving the comfort and welfare of mankind. All the peoples of the earth will be in daily conversation with each other by means of the telegraph and telephone.

Then "we may well deepen our harbors and widen their channels," and we may well remove every doubt hanging over our exchanges, so that "the ships that pass between this land and that shall be like the shuttle of the loom weaving the web of concord among the nations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10 o'clock having arrived, the House, under the order, will take a recess until to-morrow at 10.30 a. m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of January 23, 1896, calling for information as to what use, if any, was made by the Government of the plans and patents of Zebulum Parker in the construction of the canal around the Des Moines Rapids, Iowa, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers on the subject, dated the 7th instant; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an agreement made and concluded October 9, 1895, with the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation, in Montana, by William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners appointed under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1895; also the report of the commission, the proceedings of councils held with the Indians, the report of Walter H. Weed, the geologist, on the mineral resources of the lands ceded, together with the draft of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office to ratify the said agreement, as shown by their accompanying letters; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an agreement made and concluded September 26, 1895, with the Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, by William C. Pollock, George Bird Grinnell, and Walter M. Clements, commissioners, appointed under the provisions contained in the Indian appropriation act of March 2, 1895; also the report of the commission, the proceedings of the councils had with the Indians, together with the draft of a bill to ratify the agreement prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the American Academy of Medicine, praying for the enactment of legislation conferring upon the medical officers of the Navy the same status, pay, and emoluments as are now accorded to the medical officers of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented the petition of F. H. Smith and sundry other citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., and the petition of Thomas B. Maloney and sundry other citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Mrs. A. C. Dunham, president, and Mary F. Davis, secretary, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ocean Grove, N. J.; the petition of Lydia Frick and Frances Holmes, officers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dennisville, N. J., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Madison, N. J., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of James J. Nichols and 111 other citizens of Newark, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a memorial of the East Washington Citizens' Association, relative to the reclamation of the flats and the improvement of the channel of the Anacostia River. I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS presented a memorial of sundry vessel owners and practical sailors of St. Clair, Mich., remonstrating against the construction of a bridge over the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. QUAY presented the petition of D. H. McFrederick and 84 other citizens of Allegheny County, Pa., and the petition of H. J. Connor and 65 other citizens of Orangeville, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition of William Nelson Post, No. 97, Department of Colorado and Wyoming, Grand Army of the Republic, of Douglas, Wyo., praying for the enactment of a service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of the St. Louis Paint, Oil, and Drug Club, of St. Louis, Mo., comprising manufacturers and jobbers engaged in mercantile business in that city, praying for the enactment of legislation which will enable practical river men to speedily secure a permanent navigable channel in the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRAY presented a memorial of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Pa., to the President and Congress of the United States on the attitude of Congress relative to the Monroe doctrine; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia respectfully represent:

That they have been deeply moved by the menace of war between our beloved country and the parent nation, and earnestly entreat you to take no step which may increase the danger of such a calamity.

We also respectfully protest against the passage of the resolution reported by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, giving the sanction of Congress to a development of the sentiment originally enunciated by President Monroe, but hitherto advocated without color of law. By implication, if not directly, there appears to be thus claimed for the United States a self-constituted protectorate over all the other Republics in this hemisphere.

We urge that the attitude assumed by the resolution above referred to is without sanction in international usage, without historic authority, and unwarranted by the other nations concerned. Furthermore, we believe it is not rendered necessary, as alleged, because of any threatened danger to this country, while it is in its spirit belligerent and unchristian. We therefore feel that the deliberate assertion of what must be regarded as a virtual protectorate, established by the lawmaking power of the United States, would be a grave mistake, and that it were far wiser to leave the subject, as heretofore, an unformulated popular sentiment.

We submit that the position taken by President Monroe, but since repudiated by eminent statesmen, is fraught with too momentous consequences to be safely adopted by Congress under the stimulus of the present exciting controversy as to the boundary of Venezuela, while its importance demands long, careful, and cool discussion. We are persuaded that the maintenance of peaceful relations with all nations is far more in harmony with the spirit of our institutions and more worthy of a truly enlightened people than any question of boundary or ownership among the Republics of South America.

Let us therefore entreat you to listen to the teachings of the "Prince of Peace," as plainly set forth in the gospel, and not commit our hitherto favored country to a sentiment and line of foreign policy inimical to its highest interests.

Signed on behalf of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia.

SAMUEL MORRIS, President.
PHILIP C. GARRETT, Vice-President.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Secondmonth 3d, 1896.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a petition of Johnson Post, No. 23, Department of Vermont, Grand Army of the Republic, of Northfield, Vt., praying for the enactment of legislation granting a service pension to all veterans of the late war who served not less than ninety days; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRICE presented a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, urging Government protection to Christians in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution No. 19. Asking Government protection for Christians in Armenia.

Whereas the Christian people of America and the civilized world have been shocked by the intelligence of the outrages inflicted and the brutal murders committed by the Moslem savages in Armenia since the commencement of the last massacres in September, 1894, since which time, it is said, as many as 75,000 persons, men, women, and children, have been put to death for no other or better reason than because of their devotion to the Christian religion: Therefore

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That we earnestly petition our Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the adoption of such measures as will show to all the world our abhorrence of such atrocities as have been committed in Armenia, and extend to them such protection and material aid as is within the power of this Government and as will protect, in that and other fields, our missionaries from violence, outrage, and indignity, and will enable them to pursue their work of faith, labor, and love in the interest of a brighter and better civilization.

Be it further resolved, That the governor of the State of Ohio cause to be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress duly certified copies of the above resolution.

DAVID L. SLEEPER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 7, 1896.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Ohio:
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Samuel M. Taylor, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is an exemplified copy, carefully compared by me with the original rolls now on file in this office and in my official custody as secretary of state, as required by the laws of the State of Ohio, of a joint resolution adopted by the general assembly of the State of Ohio on the 7th day of February, A. D. 1896,

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, this 7th day of February, A. D. 1896.

SAMUEL M. TAYLOR,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BRICE presented the petition of J. L. Severance, president of the Euclid Avenue National Bank, of Cleveland, Ohio, praying that a change be made in the postal laws increasing the rate for carrying second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the memorial of F. D. Leslie, president of the Scientific Machinist Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, and the memorial of G. H. Gardner, secretary and treasurer of the Cleveland Printing and Publishing Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed increase of rate for carrying second-class mail matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SINKING FUND.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a preamble and resolution with an accompanying statement of the reasons therefor. I desire to state that I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to know the merits of it, but I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The paper was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Preamble and resolution respecting Pacific railroads.

Whereas the obligations of the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and of other Pacific railroad companies, designated by statutes of the United States as of lien indebtedness, prior and paramount to their indebtedness to the United States has matured; and

Whereas no public notice of the maturity of such indebtedness has been to the public or to Congress of the United States given; and

Whereas all interest accrued on bonds representing such paramount lien indebtedness for the purposes of the sinking fund have, by the terms of the statute under which they were issued, also matured; and

Whereas, without the lawful notice of maturity in respect thereof being given, such indebtedness must continue to increase at the rate of 5 per cent on the sinking-fund securities and of 6 per cent on the original bonds so secured by sinking fund; and

Whereas by reason of the premises, as well as for other causes of public good and justice, the powers provided and reserved to Congress in acts of 1862, 1864, 1878, sections 7 and 8, and of March 3, 1887, sections 4 and 5, are adequate to the protection by Congressional legislation of the joint interests of the United States and all "lawful and just creditors," as expressed in said sections 7 and 8: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to close up the sinking-fund accounts and to report the necessary appropriations, if any, to balance said sinking-fund account, and that the amount of the balance thereof be placed to the credit of the lawful and just claimants, known or unknown.

Brief. Respecting Pacific railroads.

All legislation by Congress upon the subject of the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and other Pacific railroads, beginning with the act of 1862, reserved the right to further legislate upon the subject. Hence the act of 1864 merges the act of 1862; and again, in 1878, the Thurman Act repeals, modifies, and amends all prior legislation. See Sec. 1: "And the foregoing provisions shall be deemed and taken as an amendment of said acts of 1864, as well as of said act of 1862."

And again, in the preamble to the act of May 7, 1878, it is said "that said corporations have issued and disposed of an amount of their own bonds equal to the amounts so to them issued by the United States; and have secured the same by mortgages which are a prior and paramount lien in the respects mentioned in said acts to that of the United States."

And further, "the bonds of the United States were made payable in thirty years from the date thereof, with interest at 6 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly."

And further, the bonds issued by said Central Pacific, Union Pacific, and other Pacific railroads were issued and made payable in like manner, and on like terms, to wit: "Payable in thirty years from the date thereof, with interest at 6 per cent per annum, payable half-yearly."

It will be remembered that the act of 1864 so altered and amended the act of 1862 as to make the bonds already issued by the companies a paramount lien, notwithstanding a portion of them had been issued two years prior to said enactment of 1864. Hence these bonds of these roads have all matured, while some of the Government or subsidy bonds have not yet matured; and notwithstanding that all interest accrued thereon has also matured, yet no public notice has been given or report made to Congress of such maturity.

By the act of May 7, 1878, section 3, "there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund, which shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds of the United States; and the semiannual income thereof shall be in like manner from time to time invested; and the same shall accumulate and be disposed of as hereinafter mentioned; and in making such investments the Secretary of the Treasury shall prefer the 5 per cent bonds of the United States, unless for good reasons appearing to him, and which he shall report to Congress, he shall at any time deem it advisable to invest in other bonds of the United States;" and

By the same act, section 8, "said sinking fund so established shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies repectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States, and for the claims of other creditors, if any, lawfully chargeable upon the funds so required to be paid into said sinking fund, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to the principles of equity, to the end that all persons having any claim upon said sinking fund may be entitled thereto in due order."

Act of March 3, 1887.

SEC. 4. That whenever in the opinion of the President it shall be deemed necessary to the protection of the interests and the preservation of the securities of the United States, in respect of its lien, mortgage, or other interests in any of the property of any or all of the several companies upon which a lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance paramount to the right, title, or interest of the United States for the same property or any part of the same may exist and be then lawfully liable to be enforced the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under the direction of the President, redeem or otherwise clear off such paramount lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance by paying the sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury, and the United States shall thereupon become and be subrogated to all rights and securities theretofore pertaining to the debt, mortgage, lien, or other incumbrance in respect of which such payment shall have been made.

It shall be the duty of the Attorney-General, under the direction of the President, to take all such steps and proceedings in the courts and otherwise as shall be needful to redeem such lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance and to protect and defend the rights and interests of the United States in respect of the matters in this section mentioned, to take steps to foreclose any mortgages or lien of the United States on such railroad property.

SEC. 5. That the sinking funds which are or may be held in the Treasury for the security of the indebtedness of either or all of said railroad companies may, in addition to the investments now authorized by law be invested in any bonds of the United States heretofore issued for the benefit of either or all of said companies, or in any of the first mortgage bonds of either of said companies which have been issued under the authority of any law of the United States and secured by mortgages of their roads and franchises, which by any laws of the United States have been made prior and paramount to the mortgage, lien, or other security of the United States in respect of its advances to either of said companies, as provided by law.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 674) for the relief of Jennie M. Hunt, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1183) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAFFERY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 277) for the relief of the Corn Exchange National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa., reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. QUAY subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 277) for the relief of the Corn Exchange National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa., was indefinitely postponed. It was reported adversely from the Committee on Claims this morning by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. I merely desire that instead of being postponed indefinitely it shall go upon the Calendar with the adverse recommendation of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAFFERY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1648) for the relief of Stewart College (now the Southwestern Presbyterian University), located at Clarksville, Tenn., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Holmes & Leathers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1590) for the relief of Edward H. Murrell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 75) for the relief of St. Charles College, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1083) for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 101) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the mutual account between the United States and the State of Florida, heretofore examined and stated by said Secretary under the authority of the Congress, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 644) to refund certain import duties, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1032) to regulate the natural laws of supply and demand, and to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue, to report adversely thereon. I ask for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I wish to state that I introduced the bill by request. It comes from a person of very great learning and great research into those subjects, a citizen of Florida, who feels a great interest in its presentation and its consideration by the Congress of the United States. I suppose it is of no use for me to ask that the bill should receive consideration at the hands of the Senate after its adverse report, but I desire to state that I shall move it as an amendment to any revenue bill that may be brought before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 147) granting a pension to George W. Case, late private Company B, Twenty-second New York Cavalry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 69) authorizing the preparation of a subject catalogue of the books in the law library, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1999) to provide for the observance of the 12th day of February as a national holiday, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1651) for the relief of Theophilus Fisk Mills, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 739) granting an increase of pension to C. E. Philbrook, widow of Alvah Philbrook, major of Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW January 8, 1896, reported it without amendment:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed, as now constituted, either by full committee or such subcommittee or committees as may be appointed by the chairman thereof, with the full power of such committee to continue during the coming recess of Congress the investigations authorized by the resolutions of May 13, 1890, and February 27, 1891, with the authority and in the manner and to the extent provided in said resolutions, and in the pursuance of such investigations to visit the several Indian reservations, Indian schools supported in whole or in part by the Government, and the Five Nations in the Indian Territory, or any reservation where, in the opinion of said committee, it may be necessary to extend their investigations.

Second. That said committee or subcommittee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to examine witnesses under oath touching the matters which they are hereby empowered to investigate, and may hold their sessions during the recess of the Senate at such place or places as they may determine; and the necessary and proper expense incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MCMILLAN on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer, and to have printed the reports of such hearings as the committee may determine, the expenses of the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be put upon its passage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2067) to provide for the erection upon the grounds of the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., of a bronze statue of the late Hon. He also introduced a bill (S. 2076) granting a pension to Sarah C. Moody; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2077) granting a pension to Richard T. Seltzer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2078) granting a pension to Hamlet F. Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2079) granting a pension to Thomas Fox; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 2080) to amend "An act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory"; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 2081) to correct the military record of Leverett Bradley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2082) to provide for the coin redemption of national-bank notes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2083) authorizing sale of the title of the United States in lot 5, square 1113, in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 2084) for the relief of C. A. Bjornstad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2085) for the relief of the Cut Head Sioux Indians at Fort Totten, N. Dak.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2086) granting an increase of pension to John Akers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 2087) for the relief of the legal representative of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2088) for the relief of the owners of certain cotton shipped from Natchez, Miss., in August, 1863, on the steamer Gladiator; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2089) to authorize the purchase of the manuscript of William Vans Murray; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 2090) to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

CATTLE QUARANTINE LINES.

Mr. VEST. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be directed to inform the Senate if any change has been made recently by order of the Agricultural Department in the quarantine lines heretofore established with regard to the transportation north of cattle from Texas and other Southwestern States or Territories; and if so, the nature and extent of such change, and the reasons therefor.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. VEST. I desire to call the attention of Senators whose constituents are immediately interested in the raising and sale of cattle to a statement which I have received from the largest cattle company in Texas, and which will explain fully my object in offering the resolution. I ask that the Secretary read the clipping that I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat.]

FORT WORTH, TEX., February 4.

Railway people and cattlemen of this section are very much stirred up over the reception of a proclamation just issued by the Secretary of Agriculture making some very radical changes in the quarantine lines as they apply to this State. The new line has been established just beyond the Texas State line on the west and north, practically cutting off the movement of all Texas cattle beyond that line from February 15 to November 15, except for immediate slaughter. This will suspend the movement of Texas cattle to the maturing grounds of the Northwest and the feeding pens of Kansas.

The resolution was agreed to.

ALLEGED ASSESSMENTS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether, during the year 1895 or any portion thereof, any of the employees of the Post-Office Department, while receiving pay from appropriations for that Department, did, with the knowledge, connivance, or direction of any clerk or clerks, or chief or chiefs of division, levy and collect assessments of money on and from other employees of the Department to be used, and which was used, for political purposes in States where election campaigns were in progress at that time; whether any person or persons were employed and borne on the Department rolls as employees and regularly paid as such who, while pretending to be discharging the duties of inspectors in the free-delivery service, were in fact actively engaged in aiding and assisting one of the political parties in said election campaign; whether, during such time, in room 3 of the Interior Department building, or in any other room or rooms in said building or in any other building, any employee of the Department was directing or managing the employment of persons for the purposes aforesaid and receiving and disbursing the moneys so assessed and collected, and whether such manager or director kept an account of such moneys in his own name in any bank of the city of Washington or elsewhere.

The committee will inquire and report further, whether during the period covered by this resolution any person or persons were employed by any clerk or chief of division in the Post-Office Department and kept on the Department pay rolls and paid out of the Department funds, which payment was not authorized by law or by any lawful rule or regulation of the Department, and for which services no appropriation had been made by Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, not more than two of whom shall belong to one political party, shall be appointed by the Vice-President, whose duty it shall be—

First. To investigate and report generally all material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Second. To investigate and report specially what amount of available funds, classified, was in the United States Treasury and on deposit in other places, subject to the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the time the bonds were sold or offered for sale; whether there was or was not coin enough on hand to meet all coin obligations of the Government due at the time said bonds were sold or when they were offered for sale; what obligations were due at that time and the amount of each, stated separately; what was the reason for any unusual withdrawal of coin from the Treasury shortly before bonds were sold or offered for sale, if such unusual withdrawals were in fact made, and by what persons or classes of persons and for what purpose or on what account such withdrawals were made; who purchased the bonds, in what amounts, and where, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and in what proportions, and from what persons or classes of persons the gold was procured with which to pay for the bonds, what the bonds sold for, and what was the market price of our Government bonds at the time, and what effect the bond sales had on the credit and business of the people of the United States.

Third. To investigate and report as to the manner of disposing of said bonds, by what authority, and what contracts, advertisements, or proposals were made by the Secretary of the Treasury in relation thereto; what agreements or contracts, and whether oral or in writing, and whether publicly or privately and secretly, were entered into by the Secretary of the Treasury and any other person or persons with respect to the sale and purchase of the bonds; whether any officer of the Government, or any person or persons for such officer and on his behalf and in his personal interest, and with his knowledge or consent, entered into any contract, agreement, or arrangement, directly or indirectly, with any person or persons, partnership, corporation, company, or syndicate, for the purpose of affecting the price offered or to be offered for said bonds or any of them, with the intent and expectation to receive commission or personal reward by reason of such contract, agreement, or arrangement; whether such contract or agreement had any and what effect on the prices offered for the bonds, what the effect was, and who, if any person, profited by it and to what extent.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEFFER. I have asked that the resolution lie over under the rule. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River in order that the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed may be acted upon. The bill has passed the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from Virginia to yield to me for a moment that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate full information on the following subjects:

First. The number of miles of the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company as originally constructed and as it now exists, the estimated actual cost per mile of the construction thereof, its then and present capitalization, and any change that may have been made in its capitalization, and whether, and if so, when, and to what extent, its capitalization was changed or increased, and whether such change or increase was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States, the names and residences, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively.

Second. The number of miles of the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the estimated actual cost per mile of its construction, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so, when and how often, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and whether such change or increase, if any, was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States; also the names and addresses, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, giving the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively.

Third. The number of miles of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company as originally and at present constructed, the estimated actual cost per mile of the construction thereof, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so, when and to what extent, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and if such change or increase, if any, has been, and whether it is, authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States; the names and residences, respectively, of the stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees thereof, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively, and whether such railroad was constructed on the line contemplated by the act authorizing its construction, and if not, whether its present line was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States.

Fourth. The number of miles of the main line of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company as originally and now constructed, the estimated actual cost per mile of its construction, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so, to what extent, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and whether such change or increase was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States, the names and residences, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively, and whether said railroad was constructed on the line and from and to the points contemplated by the act authorizing its construction, and if not, whether its construction on its present line was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States.

Fifth. The names under which the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company were severally constructed, and whether any changes in the names thereof have taken place since their construction, and if so, what names have been given to said respective roads and the names now in use by them, giving specifically all the changes in names and the consolidations, if any, that have taken place from the time of their construction, respectively, to the present moment, to the end that the Senate may be fully informed as to the several names under which these several railroads have been and are now being operated, and have exact information as to the consolidations and changes therein that may have taken place.

Sixth. What branches, if any, have been constructed or purchased by said respective railroads and added as feeders or otherwise to their respective main lines, giving the names of all of such railroads that may have been thus constructed or purchased by any of them, the cost of such construction or purchase, and the source from which the funds to construct or purchase the same were derived, and whether, and if so, what, sums of money were derived from the main lines of said railroads and used in the construction or purchase of any such additional railroads or feeders.

Seventh. The total amount of subsidy bonds issued in aid of the construction of said respective main lines, the total number of acres of land donated to each of them by the United States, and whether all of said lands have been selected and taken by them or not, or if any other corporation or company of persons has been formed for the purpose of handling or disposing of said ands, and if so, the names of said corporations or companies, the manner in which the lands have been disposed of by them, if any, and their present condition.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The resolution, in so far as the information sought to be obtained can be procured from the Secretary of the Interior, has my heartiest approbation, and if it be worth anything I shall be very glad to render any assistance in my power, if I could render any beyond my own vote, in securing it. But I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that he is undoubtedly asking for information from the Secretary of the Interior which it would be utterly impossible for him to furnish.

The Secretary would have very definite information as to the original grants to these companies, as to the names of the companies under which the grant was made. If official estimates preliminary to the grant were filed, the Secretary will have those, but it is doubtful whether they are in the possession of the Department. However, nearly all the other information which the Senator from Nebraska asks for the Secretary of the Interior not only can not furnish, but the information is as available to us individually as it could be to the Secretary of the Interior officially. For instance, the Senator from Nebraska asks that the Secretary of the Interior shall furnish a list of the stockholders and bondholders of the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, and the Central Pacific railroads. I take it that the Interior Department has no record of the stockholders of those roads, and all the Secretary of the Interior could do would be to ask the officers of the companies, unofficially or officially, without authority to back up his request, to please send him for the information of the Senate a list of their stockholders at the time of their last election. The list of bondholders is not forthcoming anywhere, because there is no list of bondholders of railroad companies except such as are registered. The ordinary holders of bonds are embodied in no list held by the railroad company.

Then the Senator from Nebraska asks for a statement of the construction of the branches of the different roads and how the money was obtained. I apprehend the Secretary of the Interior can not tell any more than the rest of us where those people got the money to build branches and to extend their line, and what they gave in return for it. The Secretary of the Interior can tell us how much the subsidies are, and to what companies they were granted, and under what names they were granted, but even as to the increase of the capitalization of the companies he can not tell us about it.

He can give us the information the Senator asks for as to whether any of these proceedings were authorized by Federal law. He has the same access to the Revised Statutes of the United States that we have and no more. He has nothing in his office that will show an extension or an authorization for an increase of capital stock. It would not be in the office of the Secretary of the Interior; it would be in the Statutes at Large of the United States, which, as I say, are as accessible to us as to the Secretary. We are all of us looking for information about these different railroads, and we are all anxious to obtain it.

I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that what he is asking for it would be weeks, if not months, before he could obtain, and that he is seeking it through a channel from which it can not be forthcoming.

My only suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska is that he shall modify his resolution, if the suggestion meets his approval, so as to ask of the Secretary such information as he can give. The different committees of both the House and the Senate are holding meetings now, and for years they have held meetings. There have been report after report from all these railroad companies. There have been report after report from all these committees. All this information is embodied in different printed documents, which at one time or another have been before the Senate and before the House, except the list of stockholders which the Senator asks for.

I am ready to meet any suggestion the Senator from Nebraska can make that he thinks will furnish the faintest light on the existing situation, but, as I said before, I suggest to him that he so modify his resolution, first, that the Secretary be asked to give only such information as he has and is entitled to have; and, second, that it be so modified as to ask only for information which could be forthcoming within a reasonable time and within a reasonable compass. It would take months before this information could be furnished, and it would take a thousand pages or more to furnish it.

Mr. ALLEN. I may be permitted to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that if none of the information which is called for is in the possession of the Secretary of the Interior he can respond promptly to that effect. I am informed, however, that in the office of the Commissioner of Public Lands, and also in the office of the Commissioner of Railways, there can be found most of this information, though possibly not all of it. I have simply made the resolution broad enough to cover everything that the Secretary of the Interior may have in any of his Bureaus, and any information he can procure elsewhere for us to be used in legislation upon this subject. I think there can be no serious objection to the resolution in its present form, because the Secretary can readily state that he has not information on a given point or has not access to it, and can answer that portion upon which he has information.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think I should like to see the resolution in print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

STENOGRAPHER TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer, the expense of the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION INVESTIGATING COMMISSION.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 3,500 bound copies of the report of the Immigration Investigating Commission, appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of June 13, 1894, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 1,500 copies for the use of the Bureau of Immigration, Treasury Department.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I rise to a question of privilege. When the committee assignments were made some appointments were given to certain Senators on this side of the Chamber with the understanding that they would hold them merely until the Senators from Utah should arrive, and that then they would relinquish them in order to make places for the Utah Senators. The matter has now been arranged satisfactorily, so that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] will ask to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on Indian Depredations; the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], from the Committee on Mines and Mining; the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE], from the Select Committee on Forest Reservations, and these three vacancies will be filled by the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN]. It has also been arranged that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will ask to be relieved from duty upon the Committee on Pensions; the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], from the Committee on Relations with Canada, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], from the Committee on Manufactures, and the vacancies occasioned in this way will be filled by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON]. The whole matter can be attended to now.

Mr. CAMERON was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. LODGE was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PETTIGREW was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. SEWELL was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Indian Depredations.

Mr. MANTLE was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Select Committee on Forest Reservations.

Mr. PERKINS was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Relations with Canada.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that the vacancies be filled by the Vice-President.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to fill the vacancies. Mr. BROWN was appointed upon the Committee on Mines and Mining, the Select Committee on Forest Reservations, and the Committee on Indian Depredations. Mr. CANNON was appointed upon the Committees on Relations with Canada, on Pensions, and on Manufactures.

ASSISTANT DOORKEEPERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HALE. If the era of resignation has been completed——

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to announce that I shall not call up the resolution in regard to the employment of assistant doorkeeper——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay the resolution before the Senate.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SHERMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That Alonzo H. Stewart, of Iowa, be, and he is hereby, chosen assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] I propose to let that matter go over until tomorrow after the morning business; and I hope that Senators will be present at that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be passed over.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be now laid before the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to state that I had the floor to call up the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed what is known as the memorial-bridge bill, and only yielded to morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct, and the Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose, of course, to interfere with morning business.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I will state that I had called up the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed what is known as the memorial-bridge bill, and yielded that other Senators might get through morning business. I hope the Senator will not take me off my feet, but will allow me to have that matter disposed of.

Mr. HALE. I shall not interfere with the purpose of the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. I now ask the Senate to proceed to consider the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 176 was passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider the vote by which the bill the title of which will be read was passed.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading will also be reconsidered.

Mr. BLANCHARD. What is the parliamentary status of the bill now, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has voted to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and by unanimous consent the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading has been reconsidered.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that, at the instance of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], there was an amendment attached to the bill providing that the District of Columbia should pay half the expenses of the construction of the bridge, and a motion was entered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, in order that that amendment might be again acted upon by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana will be regarded as reconsidered. The question now is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That one-half of the cost of said bridge shall be paid by the District of Columbia and one-half by the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that an amendment offered to the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is an amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana, and is the pending motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. To insert that provision?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To insert that provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard the reading imperfectly. Would that require the whole expense of the bridge to be paid by the people of the District of Columbia?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No, one-half.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is right. I think the United States ought to pay one-half of the cost of that bridge, because the bridge connects the property of the United States on the other side of the river with its property in the District, and will enormously add to the value of that land owned by the United States. It is not right to put the whole expense of the bridge on the District of Columbia. I inferred when I rose that there was an effort to throw the whole expense upon the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL. It was provided by the amendment that half the expense should be borne by the District.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, when this bill was under consideration by the Senate a couple of weeks ago, I suggested the propriety of an amendment by which the revenues of the District of Columbia should be taxed one-half of the expense of the proposed memorial bridge. Some debate was had at the time upon this amendment and the Senate adopted it. In that shape the bill then passed the Senate. Following the passage of the bill, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. His purpose was to ultimately defeat the amendment which taxed the District with one-half of the expense of the structure. The bill is now before the Senate for its consideration anew, and the pending question is on the amendment I offered, heretofore referred to.

It is always an ungracious task to run counter to the wishes of those among whom one's lot is pleasantly cast to the extent that ours—those of us who hold positions in the legislative branch of the Government—is with the agreeable and cultured people who inhabit the District of Columbia.

Following the adoption by the Senate of the amendment I offered, much has been said among the people of the District and in the press of the District of criticism of my action and of the action of the Senate. I take this in good part. It is nothing more than a friendly difference of opinion.

No one is more proud of this capital city of our Republic than I. Everywhere we go, whether in our own country or abroad, meeting with anyone who has ever been to Washington, we hear always words of praise for the city of Washington, of the beautiful situation which it occupies, of its grand streets and avenues. We have cause to be proud of it. I believe it is destined to be the finest capital in the world. The Government of the United States should act toward it with no stinted hand. At the same time, Mr. President, we should be just to the body of the taxpayers of the United States in the matter of appropriations for the District and for District purposes. Care should be had that the Federal Treasury be called on to contribute no more than is just for public works here calculated to greatly benefit the District and private property in the District.

For the past eighteen years the Government of the United States has been paying one-half of the entire expense of supporting the District. That policy was adopted at a time when there were 100,000 citizens less in the District than there are to-day. When Washington was a small city, it was well for the Government to pay half of the expenses of the maintenance of the District, and in the earlier times to pay even more than half; but when Washington has grown from a small city to one having upward of 250,000 inhabitants, the policy which was justified by the conditions of the earlier period can not be justified now. As the city becomes larger and more wealthy less and less should become the proportion the Federal Treasury is called upon to contribute.

This matter of the relation of the Government to the District was considered by a commission appointed in 1874, and, after an investigation running through several years, on the 11th of June, 1878, they submitted a report, in which is given the conclusions of the commission as to the amount of the District expenses with which the Federal Treasury should be taxed. This report was that at that time a fair proportion of the expense of maintaining the District government to be borne by the Federal Treasury was 40 per cent. Congress, however, increased this to 50 per cent, and from that time to this the Federal Government has been paying 50 per cent of all the expenses of every kind and character in the District of Columbia. I will read the conclusions of the commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it a House, a Senate, or a joint committee?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was a joint committee, I think. I quote from the report:

> Your committee has been convinced that it is the duty of Congress to make regular annual appropriations toward the expenses of the District government, and from a careful examination of the estimated value of the property owned by the United States and that belonging to private persons and corporations the committee considers the fair proportional part thereof which the Federal Government should bear is not less that 40 per cent, and the remaining 60 per cent should be realized by taxation.

Mr. President, this was eighteen years ago. Since that time the city of Washington has increased in population 100,000. If it were proper in 1878, according to the report of this committee, that the body of the taxpayers of the United States should only be taxed with 40 per cent of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the Government, a fortiori should that amount now be less, inasmuch as the number of taxpayers and the aggregate of taxable wealth in the District have both greatly increased. There are now 30,000 taxpayers in the city of Washington, and the aggregate of the assessment of property in the District of Columbia is put down by the assessors at $191,417,804. We all know that property is never assessed at its full value for the purposes of taxation; if it is ever done, the instances are rare. It is safe to say, therefore, that there is not less than $250,000,000 of taxable property in the District of Columbia. It is perhaps double what it was in 1878, at which time the 40 per cent pro rata was recommended, which Congress at that time increased to 50 per cent.

The assessors of the District have placed an estimate on the property which the Federal Government owns in the District of Columbia, and they make it foot up a total valuation of $198,058,139; but how do they arrive at this? In this way:

United States property: Value of land, not including streets and alleys	$98,705,639
Value of improvements belonging to the Government	99,352,500

It will be observed that in order to reach this aggregate valuation they charge against the Government, at the usual price per square foot at which private property is assessed in the District, all the land included in all the parks of the city. Take the park in which this Capitol is situated. That is charged for against the Government at so much a foot. Take the Mall that extends from the foot of Capitol Hill to the river, including the grounds upon which the Washington Monument is situated, including the Agricultural grounds, the Smithsonian grounds, the Botanic Gardens; all this is charged against the Government in order to arrive at this aggregate assessment of $198,000,000. Lafayette Square, Franklin Square, Lincoln Park, Judiciary Square, the White House grounds, the White Lot, and all of the triangular spaces which are left where the avenues intersect the streets and which so beautify this capital city, are charged against the Government in order to arrive at the total valuation mentioned.

This is not fair; it is not just. The parks which adorn and beautify the city should not be taken into account as owned by the Government when the assessors come to figure up the amount of property held in the District by the Federal Government in order to ascertain the relative proportion of that property to the property owned in the District by private parties.

It would be fair to assess against the Government the grounds upon which the public buildings are situated, and a fair valuation should be placed upon the buildings in order to arrive at this relative proportion; but it is not just to charge up to the Government all the parks, which are common to all the inhabitants. Every city of the United States provides its own parks and maintains them. In the city of Washington the Government is not only charged up with the ownership of the parks, but, as I understand it, the expense for the maintenance of these parks, with certain exceptions, which I shall hereafter mention, is borne exclusively by the Federal Government. If that statement is correct, and I believe it is, then the Government not only furnishes to Washington all the parks in the city, but is called on to defray the whole amount of expense of beautifying and maintaining them.

The exceptions are the two parks known as the Rock Creek Park and the Zoological Park. When it became advisable to acquire the property now known as the Rock Creek Park, embracing 1,515 acres, Congress in its wisdom saw proper not only to tax the District of Columbia with one-half of the expense of the acquisition of the property, but likewise imposed upon the District one-half of the expense of the maintenance of the park. So also as to the Zoological Park, which contains 166⅔ acres, the District of Columbia was required to pay one-half of the purchase money of the ground, and, as I understand, is taxed to defray one-half of the expense of the maintenance of the park.

The fact that the District was required to meet one-half of the expense of acquiring the ground for these two parks evidences, I think, the determination of Congress to depart from the old system of requiring the Government to meet all the park expenses of the city. Again, in 1893, when it was proposed to extend the system of avenues and streets in the city of Washington to the District outside of the city, Congress, in its wisdom, required that the cost of the extension of the plan of streets and avenues should be at the sole cost of the District and private land owners. I understand, however, recently one of the courts of the District has annulled this act as being, perhaps, unconstitutional, but that does not militate against the position I now take, which is that these several acts, the one acquiring the Rock Creek Park, another acquiring the Zoological Park, and the third extending the system of streets and avenues of the city out into the District, all evidence a departure by Congress from the policy adopted heretofore, under which the Government is charged with the full ownership of all of the parks and is taxed with the entire expense of their maintenance.

Down at the river, near the Washington Monument, are seven hundred to a thousand acres of land which the Government is reclaiming. It is to be made into a great driving park. The appropriations for this reclamation have been carried upon the river and harbor appropriation bill. They were originally placed there upon the idea that this was to improve the harbor of the city of Washington. Now we all know that the improvement of the harbor of the city of Washington by the reclamation of the Potomac Flats was but an incident, and that the acquisition of this 700 acres of ground, wresting it from the waters of the Potomac, was the primary purpose of the appropriations.

All this expense is being borne by the Federal Treasury. My recollection is that about two and a quarter million dollars have already been expended in reclaiming this ground, which will be added to the city and greatly adorn and beautify it. So it would seem that want of liberality by the Government toward the District can not be truthfully charged.

Mr. President, no one opposes the passage of this bill. I for one do not. I am heartily in favor of the construction of the memorial bridge across the Potomac River to connect the city of Washington with the grounds of the national cemetery at Arlington. It is a great work, that ought to be undertaken at this time. The only difference between myself and the Senator from Virginia, the author of the measure, is as to who shall bear the expense. He thinks it should come entirely out of the Federal Treasury. I believe that as this structure will greatly benefit and beautify the city of Washington, one-half of the expense of the structure should be paid out of the District revenues.

On the former occasion when this bill was under consideration I did not object to its passage, and I do not object to its passage now. I deemed it my duty, however, to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate in order to have it determined whether the Federal Government should pay the full expense of such a structure or whether the revenues of the District of Columbia should be taxed for one-half of the expense thereof. If the policy be right that the Federal Government should pay one-half of all the expenses necessary to maintain the District of Columbia, then I submit that it is but fair and just to the taxpayers of the United States that one-half of the expense of structures of this kind within the limits of the District should be taxed against the District revenues.

If the Federal Government was paying only a just proportion of the annual expenses necessary to maintain the District, which in my opinion at this time would be only about 33⅓ per cent instead of 50 per cent, there would be greater reasons for Congress to be liberal in respect to making appropriations out of the Treasury to pay the whole expense of such structures. But so long as the Federal Government is called upon to pay more than its just proportion of the expenses of the District, then structures of this kind should come under the same policy, and the District revenues should be taxed with one-half of their cost.

The last District appropriation act carried an aggregate of $5,745,443, and one-half of it, or the sum of $2,872,721, was appropriated out of the Federal Treasury. In other words, the Federal Treasury is contributing approximating $3,000,000 every year for the purpose of maintaining the District of Columbia. Every policeman on the streets of Washington is paid one-half of his compensation out of the Federal Treasury. The schools of the District are paid out of the Federal Treasury to the extent of 50 per cent of the amount appropriated for such purposes. In the last act making appropriations for the District of Columbia the improvement and repairs account, which includes sewers and streets, amounted to $1,152,100. The Federal Government pays half of it. For public schools the appropriation amounted to $1,137,616. The Federal Treasury pays half of it. For the Metropolitan police $558,745 was appropriated. The Federal Government pays half of it, and so on down the list—the fire department, the health department, reformatories and prisons, support of the insane, charities, and water department.

Now, all other cities pay, themselves, the full amount of such expenses, and fortunate indeed is the city of Washington that it has the Federal Treasury to share the cost of these things. I am far from objecting to a liberal policy toward the District, but I do insist that 50 per cent now is too much for the Treasury to contribute. It may have been just in 1878, when adopted, but is no longer so.

When a bill similar to the one which is now before the Senate was first introduced in 1894 in the House of Representatives it contained a clause reading "one-half of the cost of said bridge to be taken from the revenues of the District of Columbia." It is true that when the committee in the other body came to consider the bill it struck out the clause I have read, but the House, I understand, did not pass the bill at that time.

I again repeat that I have no purpose whatever to endeavor to defeat the passage of the pending bill. If the Senate in its wisdom should see proper to vote down the amendment providing that the District revenues should be taxed with one-half of the expense of the bridge, I will testify my desire that the bridge shall be constructed by voting for the measure anyhow; but if it were right and proper to charge the District revenues with one-half of the cost of the national parks known as the Rock Creek and the Zoological parks, as was done when those bills were passed, then I think it is wise and just and proper that the District should be taxed with one-half of the cost of this structure.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment. The bill provides for a bridge to be called a memorial bridge. It is proposed to make it monumental in its character and of a high order of architectural merit.

So far as it is a memorial of course the Government should pay the whole expense, the same as it does for any of the monuments, the Peace Monument, or any other monument in the city. It has been suggested that the proposed bridge shall be called the Bridge of Peace—bridging the bloody chasm, symbolizing the reuniting of the two sections of the country. It is to be built entirely upon Government ground. It is to start from the Naval Observatory and to land on the Virginia side upon the Arlington estate. It seems to me clearly that for these reasons it should be exclusively a Government enterprise.

Again, it is not proposed to construct the bridge for the benefit of the people of the District, on which ground other expenses of the District are made, because the use of tramways, cars, the poor man's carriage, is expressly prohibited. It seems to me that for every reason it should be exclusively a Government undertaking. I am opposed to the amendment, and trust the bill will pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, one single word. I heartily agree with what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has stated. I think we are a little too much in the habit of dividing with the people of the District things that belong to the national capital and which are undertaken chiefly because this is the national capital. I would not demand of the District that it pay one farthing of the expense of the bridge. It is for the general public use of the nation, and its commercial value, in one sense, is very small.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this subject has been repeatedly before both Houses of Congress, and the question under discussion to-day has been repeatedly discussed, and always, so far as I know, determined upon the side of the report now made by the Committee on Commerce. The question was considered by our committee, and unanimously decided in accordance with the bill as reported by me the other day; in other words, that the United States should pay the entire expense of the structure.

As has been stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], if this is not a memorial bridge, but simply a commercial structure, then it should be considered upon a very different basis. If it is a memorial bridge, and if any sentiment enters into it at all, then the entire cost should willingly be paid by the people of the whole United States.

This city will always remain the capital of this country. That goes without saying. There are priceless traditions and memories connected with the establishment of the national capital here, which will always retain the seat of government. The great city in my own State some years ago was presented as a claimant for the capital of the Union, but the proposition was never seriously entertained, even among the citizens of St. Louis. I believe that on a popular vote to-day the city of Washington would be overwhelmingly and almost unanimously declared to be the eternal capital of what I hope is to be an eternal Government. It is useless to discuss that proposition, and therefore when any question of this sort comes before us it ought to be considered with reference to the perpetuity of the capital of the United States.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], with whom I have not the slightest controversy, says that when we made the District of Columbia pay one-half of the purchase money and one-half of the expense of the Zoological and Rock Creek parks, we established a precedent in regard to this matter. I beg his pardon. That legislation was extremely doubtful and was strenuously resisted, and it finally passed through Congress with protest against it by a very large minority in both Houses. But those cases are entirely different from the present. The Zoological Garden and the Rock Creek Park are upon one side of the Potomac River, and if it be assumed that they are municipal establishments, which I deny, there is a plausibility in the assumption that the District of Columbia should pay one-half of the expense.

Here, upon the contrary, is a bridge between Virginia and the District of Columbia. The farmers of Virginia in the vicinity of Arlington have urged en masse that the bridge should be constructed. They have called upon me personally as chairman of the subcommittee on bridges of the Commerce Committee and urged the necessity for this structure. I have here, and but for the limited time given us would like the Senate to hear, the report of the Secretary of War, which is one of a dozen made in regard to the bridge, in which he urges its construction for military purposes, and besides that because the value of 1,000 acres reclaimed in the Potomac Flats and the 1,100 acres in the Arlington tract which was seized by the Government and afterwards partially paid for to the Lee family would be immensely enhanced by the construction of this bridge.

So, even from a financial view, the argument is overwhelmingly in favor of its construction at the expense of the United States, because the property of the United States will be enormously increased in value by its construction. The cases are not parallel, and if the District of Columbia is made to pay one-half of the expense, striking out all sentiment, then the State of Virginia should pay the other half, because the people of Virginia, and particularly those in the vicinity of Arlington, are especially in favor of putting this bridge across the Potomac River.

My friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] speaks of the reclamation of the Potomac Flats. I had the honor to serve upon that committee fifteen years ago. Those flats were principally reclaimed for sanitary reasons. The evidence before the Potomac Flats Committee was overwhelming that the health not only of the citizens of Washington, but of the denizens of this city, including members of Congress and officials of the Government, was endangered from year to year by the existence of that swamp. It was absolutely necessary to reclaim those flats, and if, when reclaimed, they were not worth one cent to the Government of the United States, I repeat that for sanitary reasons the reclamation must necessarily have been made. It was urged and proved before our committee, when we made the first appropriation, that a portion of this city was becoming uninhabitable by reason of the vicinity of the Potomac Flats. We have now, after spending an enormous amount of money, reclaimed them, and given to the Government a thousand acres of valuable land. But that is infinitesimal compared with the importance of that improvement from a sanitary point of view.

That does not stand upon all fours with the present proposition.

I repeat, that if this in the first place is to be a memorial bridge it should be paid for by the Government of the United States as a national structure. If it is to be a commercial structure, one-half should be paid by the District of Columbia and one-half by the State of Virginia.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has alluded to the report of the assessment for the District of Columbia, and he has correctly quoted it. There is exempt from taxation in the District $198,058,139 of United States property, excluding streets and alleys belonging to the Government, while for the District of Columbia there is exempt only $3,653,820. Now, if it is insisted that these bodies, the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia, are separate entities, then look at the vast disparity in the ownership by the United States and by the District of Columbia of property in the District.

The Senator from Louisiana referred to the parks which are maintained by the Government, the ground upon which the Capitol is located, and the ground upon which the beautiful Library building is located. Does it not belong to the Government, and could we not sell it to-morrow? What is the difference between the ownership of the United States in this property and the ownership of any Senator in the real estate upon which he resides? What is the difference, if the argument of the Senator from Louisiana that these parks beautify the city of Washington is to obtain, between the ground and the building, which also beautifies this city and makes it attractive to visitors. What to-day forms a greater attraction than the magnificent Library building, like which there is nothing upon the Continent of Europe, a thing of beauty forever, an ornament, a matter of pride to every American citizen? That beautifies the city of Washington, but it belongs to all the people of this whole country.

Mr. President, I protest against the argument that the city of Washington is not the property of every man, woman, and child in the United States. It is our property. Any citizen of this country can come here and reside if he sees proper to do so, and because some of them have come here and have acquired property and become citizens of the District, why should they be separated from the balance of the people of the United States and be made to bear unusual burdens? It is our city, our capital, and when we put improvements here in the name of the whole people of the United States, we should pay for them.

I might read here repeated reports showing that when a private corporation applied to Congress for the privilege of building this bridge across the Potomac, it was denied, and it was denied upon the report of the Bureau of Engineers of the War Department that the structure should be built on Government ground upon both sides of the river and under the absolute control of the Government of the United States, that for military purposes it should belong to the Government, that it should be a governmental structure, as a matter of course to be paid for by all the people of the whole Union. I have no criticism to make of the statement or motives of the Senator from Louisiana; but, sir, I believe it is just and right that the Government should pay the entire cost of this bridge.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, just one word, because I am called out. I think a bill for this bridge has been reported three times from the Committee on Commerce. If I am mistaken the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] will correct me.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; three times.

Mr. FRYE. It has been unanimously reported every time, and no member of that committee ever made a suggestion that the District of Columbia should pay half the cost. That was done after consideration; it was with the full understanding of the purpose of the bridge—that it was to be a memorial bridge; that it was to be ornamented with statues of Grant, Lincoln, and other great men of the Republic. Where, then, is the sense or propriety, if it is to be a memorial bridge, of saying that the District of Columbia shall pay half? If Congress appropriates $25,000 or $50,000 for a statue of General Hancock, why, pray, should not the District of Columbia with the same propriety be compelled to pay one-half of the appropriation made for that statue? As the Senator from Missouri well said, if it is not a memorial bridge and is simply a commercial structure, then certainly Virginia must pay half and the District of Columbia the other half. I was amazed when I heard that a proposition had been made here that the District of Columbia should pay one-half the cost of a memorial bridge which the Congress of the United States, representing all the people of the United States, compels the erection of.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Maine, as he is chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether the committee did not fully intend to carry out his view and destroy any idea of its being a commercial structure by the latter clause of the bill, which reads:

Shall be used exclusively for foot passengers and vehicles, and prohibited to all tramways, whether propelled by steam, electric, cable, horse, or other power.

Mr. FRYE. The committee intended it purely and simply as a memorial bridge.

Mr. FAULKNER. And so put in that clause, excluding the idea of a commercial structure.

Mr. FRYE. And put in that clause excluding all tramways, railway cars, and cars of every kind.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I agree fully with what has been said about the importance of this structure being considered as a memorial bridge, and I shall vote against the amendment; but I wish to move, in line 11 of section 2, after the word "tramways," to insert "or railroads," so that the dedication to the traveling public shall be complete, excluding tramways and railroads. It will then read:

Shall be used exclusively for foot passengers and vehicles, and prohibited to all tramways or railroads, whether propelled by steam, electric, cable, horse, or any other power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). The Chair understands that the question is first on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to amend that; but if that shall be voted down then I will offer the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. MILLS. Let us take the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the Senator from Maine does not desire to occupy the floor, I should like to take it for five or ten minutes.

Mr. HALE. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, this proposed structure has been given a high-sounding title, and on that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] makes a patriotic speech—a great memorial bridge that is to span the Potomac River, uniting the North and the South.

Because it is gilded with this high-sounding title the proposition has no greater force than it would have without it. After all, it is but a bridge to be constructed over the Potomac River. You may call it a memorial bridge, or you may give it any other grand title, but a moment's reflection must convince anyone that this adds no additional weight to it. Every bridge heretofore constructed over the Potomac River or the Eastern Branch of the Potomac has been paid for one-half by the Federal Treasury, the other half by the District revenues.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana, if he will permit me, whether or not those are not all commercial bridges? In other words, we have a right to put over those bridges tramways, railways, street railways, and all other traffic. These are excluded by the very terms of the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will answer the Senator from West Virginia. They are all commercial bridges, and so is this a commercial bridge, with the single exception that it is not to be made a bridge for the passage of street railways and tramways. Every wagon transporting freight or articles of commerce that comes along can cross the bridge. Every carriage, every footman, every bicycle rider can cross it. I agree with the proposition that street cars and tramways should not be permitted to pass over it. Confine them to the other bridges. But, because they are prohibited, that does not take this bridge out of the category of being a highway bridge for general purposes, and such it is. If it were right and proper to tax the District revenues with the expense of all previous bridges, why is it not right and proper to tax the District revenues with one-half the expense of this bridge?

The Senator from Missouri says it is because the War Department needs it for military purposes, and therefore the Government should have it all.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri perhaps forgets that under the Constitution of the United States Congress has exclusive jurisdiction in matters of legislation over the District. Congress could direct, in case of necessity, that all of the other bridges be set aside for military purposes. Because a military establishment is maintained at Fort Myer, on the other side of the river, is no reason why this structure should be any more denominated a military bridge than is the bridge above this proposed site which now spans the Potomac at Georgetown. That bridge is just as near Fort Myer as this one would be. It is true, and upon this the Secretary of War in his report lays stress, that it would be nearer the capital from the military post at Fort Myer over this memorial bridge than it would be over the Long Bridge or over the bridge at Georgetown. But the capital is sufficiently easy of access by means of the other bridges. It is rather straining matters to claim that justification for this structure rests on the necessity for a more direct approach to the capital by the military forces stationed at Fort Myer.

The Senator from Missouri, referring to the flats of the Potomac that have been reclaimed, says the main purpose of that work was not to reclaim seven hundred or a thousand acres of land, but to benefit the health of the city of Washington. Grant it. He says that it was a great sanitary work. Grant it. Should not the city of Washington or the revenues of the District have been taxed for doing something which was so greatly to benefit the health of the people who live here and who own property here? It seems to me so. That was eminently a work one-half of which should have been charged against the District, but it was not. No one ever opposed the reclamation of the flats. I have never done so.

At the other end of the Capitol, serving on the River and Harbor Committee, I time and again supported appropriations to continue this work; but, Mr. President, I always had the idea that it was a work one-half of which should have been paid by the District of Columbia. It was begun before I entered Congress. I found it a charge on the river and harbor bill, the Government paying the entire expense, and as chairman of that committee in the House I continued it on the bill. It should in the first instance have gone on the District appropriation bill. Two and a quarter millions have already been expended, and the work is not yet completed. It will take perhaps a million dollars more, every dollar of which is to be met by the body of the taxpayers of the United States.

Some reforms, Mr. President, are evidently needed. Under the theory upon which this capital was founded the fee simple in the land forming the parks is in the Government. But that is immaterial. The point I make is that when you come to consider what is a fair proportion of the expense that the Federal Treasury should bear in maintaining the District there should not be charged up against the Government the ownership of the parks in the city. It is not who owns the parks. If they are owned by the Federal Government they are here for the benefit of all visitors who come here, and they are here more especially for the benefit of the people who make the District their homes. The parks could not be more common to the use of the people of the District if the city itself owned them. They are public parks, and public parks are always exempt from taxation. Those in the city of Washington should be exempt from taxation, but in point of fact they are not, for the Government is charged with their ownership in order to arrive at a larger proportionate sum for the Government to contribute toward the maintenance of the District. If the parks were eliminated from calculation, a fair proportion of the expenses of the District chargeable to the Government would not be 33⅓ per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from Louisiana informs me that he is through with his speech. I ask that a vote be taken on the pending amendment.

Mr. HALE. And then let me offer my amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Let a vote be first taken on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. HALE. Yes, we will vote on that first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I do not know how he would vote and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I notice that he is not present and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Has he voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Iowa has not voted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know how he would vote and I shall not cast my vote. I should vote "nay," if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Allen,	Berry,	Chilton,	Peffer,
Bate,	Blanchard,	Mills,	Pettigrew.

NAYS—54.

Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Brice,	Gallinger,	Mantle,	Sherman,
Brown,	Gibson,	Martin,	Smith,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Caffery,	Gray,	Mitchell, Wis.	Teller,
Call,	Hale,	Morgan,	Tillman,

Baker,	Gear,	Murphy,	Turpie,
Blackburn,	George,	Nelson,	Wetmore,
Butler,	Gordon,	Pasco,	White,
Clark,	Irby,	Pritchard,	Wilson.
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Shoup,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I shall modify the amendment of which I gave notice, because the last clause of the bill, referring to the bridge, says, "which shall be used exclusively for foot passengers and vehicles, and prohibited to all tramways, whether propelled by steam, electric, cable, horse, or other power." I am inclined to think that that would exclude persons riding, which ought not to be done. Therefore, after the word "bridge," in line 9, on page 2, I move to strike out all that follows and to insert:

The use of which is hereby prohibited to all tramways or railroads, whether propelled by steam, electric, cable, horse, or other power.

That leaves it open to persons walking, driving, or riding.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know whether it is intended to leave the bridge open to the carriage of freight by heavily loaded teams. If it is, the Senator's amendment does not cover that point.

Mr. HALE. The bill itself would include those. All vehicles are allowed in the bill as it now stands. I do not meddle with that at all; I only seek to exclude tramways and railroads, and to leave it otherwise, as was evidently intended, so that persons on horseback would not be excluded, as they might be by the language of the bill. I have not gone into the question about heavy teams, because they are included, of course, in the word "vehicles."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. The unfinished business being before the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has asked me to yield to him for a moment, and I do so.

CAPT. GEORGE H. PERKINS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 129) for the relief of Capt. George H. Perkins. If there is any objection to the bill, I should like to make a very brief explanation; but I feel sure there will be no objection to it, inasmuch as a similar bill was passed by the Senate in a previous Congress and reported favorably by the committee of the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Capt. George H. Perkins, who was retired as captain after forty years' faithful service upon the active list of the United States Navy, as provided by section 1443, Revised Statutes, and who had honorable service in the late civil war, shall be placed on the retired list with the rank of commodore without the corresponding increased pay, but receiving only the retired pay of captain of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 39) making an appropriation to defray the joint expense of locating the boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and the British North American territory.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892;

A bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4785) to incorporate the National University;

A bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the road of said company, under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895;

A bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5490) to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 98) directing the Secretary of War to cause Lieut. Col. Jared A. Smith, Corps of Engineers, to submit a plan and estimate for the further improvement of Conneaut Harbor, in the State of Ohio.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now let the unfinished business be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to insert, after line 24, on page 3:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporarily in the Treasury Department, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, not exceeding 25 expert money counters, at a rate not exceeding $60 per month each, $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the beginning of the clause in line 10, on page 4, to insert the subheading "Custom-house building, Chicago, Ill."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 15, on page 5, the last clause read being an appropriation of $45,000 for the transportation of silver coin.

Mr. ALLEN. Before that provision is passed over, I think it requires an explanation from the Senator in charge of the bill. The provision is that—

In expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries free of charge silver coin when requested to do so.

Under what circumstances would the Government be required to transport silver coin and to what places?

Mr. HALE. I have sent for the document in relation to that matter.

Mr. ALLEN. I might ask the Senator from Maine, in this connection, where there is any provision in this or in any other bill or law requiring the Government at its own expense to transport gold coin, and, if there is not, why gold and silver are not put upon an equality in this respect?

Mr. HALE. This matter was originally put into an appropriation bill at the suggestion of Senators who agree with the Senator from Nebraska with reference to silver. It is in the interests of the transportation of silver. I do not know now that any such provision in terms has been put in the law with relation to gold, but if the Senator believes that the privilege which is accorded here to the holders of silver should also be accorded to the holders of gold I for one have no objection to an amendment including gold.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] I think had something to do with this provision, and knows about it. It is, as I have said, in the interest of free transportation wherever silver may be wanted at the expense of the Government, and I do not object to gold being put on the same basis, although the committee has not authorized me to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. STEWART. Let us have the provision read.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the provision. I will say it is the same provision which is in the law now, and my impression is that it was originally put in at the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada. I am not certain about it, but I think so.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The provision referred to will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Transportation of silver coin: For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $45,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

Mr. STEWART. I think I did have something to do with suggesting that provision of law. As I now remember, this was the object intended: It frequently happens that small silver coins are returned to the Treasury from different sections of the country, and there is frequently a great inconvenience for the want of small change in the trading community, which drifts into the Treasury. This provision was really for the benefit of the trading public who want small change. It does not apply to gold, for the reason that there is no like necessity in that case. Gold is not used, in the first place, and is not in common circulation.

Mr. HALE. It does not get into one's pocket.

Mr. STEWART. No; it is not used for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. Is this provision simply designed, in case where small banks and bankers want subsidiary coin, to cover the expense of transporting that coin from the Treasury or the subtreasuries to the banks?

Mr. STEWART. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to it if that be the case.

Mr. CULLOM. It is helping to get silver into circulation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed at line 16, on page 5. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, after line 13, to insert:

For the entire compensation of George R. Davis, director-general of the World's Columbian Exposition, in the work of preparing his final report, and for all sums expended or paid out by him upon such work, and for any sums due under agreements or contracts for assistants for such work, such sum to be in full for all claims therefor, $18,006.10: Provided, That the original typewritten or written manuscript of such work, all illustrations, diagrams, and plans incorporated in such work, and all plates and negatives of photographs taken therefor in the hands of the director-general shall be by him deposited with the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be some explanation of this item. I see in this bill that altogether there is something like $40,000 appropriated in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition. I have looked over the explanation of the matter in the report of the committee, and it seems that the national commission has not passed on this amount, and the director-general has received heretofore a very large salary. It seems to me that if there is any necessity for this additional appropriation it should be stated, and it would be interesting for the country to know whether this is the last amount that is to be appropriated on account of the Columbian Exposition.

Mr. HALE. It is not by any means the last call that will be made upon Congress in connection with the exposition. The experience we have had with this exposition is what is always found in all such cases. We proposed to limit the appropriations for all purposes to a fixed sum originally, but that was very largely exceeded, doubled, and I do not know but trebled; and to-day, with all the interest which the American people took in that great exposition, there has been no report made or published. At some time when we have more money with which to do our housekeeping Congress will be called upon to print and circulate among the people the reports of that great exposition, and it will be no small work; but the committee does not now ask Congress to enter upon that large expenditure, which will be some hundreds of thousands of dollars. That subject will come up hereafter, and the Committee on Printing at some future day will, on conference with the Public Printer, submit statements and estimates covering this work.

The item which is here, together with an amendment which I shall offer, covers the work which has been done and the money paid out in preparing these final reports largely by the director-general, Mr. Davis, of Chicago, and Mr. Palmer, who served with some of us here in the Senate, who was president of the commission. The committee has a detailed statement, which will be found in Senate Report No. 150, showing how this money goes, where it has been paid out, and for what purposes. So that if any Senator desires to know what makes up this sum he can look at that document.

I shall not go into any further detailed statement in regard to the subject, for I hope that what I have said will satisfy the Senator from Florida that the scope into which the committee has gone has been very narrow, and has been only the necessary incidental work in the preparation of the report.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if this is an addition to the salary which this gentleman has hitherto received in connection with the official position he held?

Mr. HALE. No, it is for work performed since his salary ceased; it is not a duplication.

Mr. CULLOM. And most of it is to reimburse him for money actually expended.

Mr. HALE. A large portion of it is to reimburse him for money actually paid out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now offer an amendment to come in at the end of the amendment just adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just adopted it is proposed to insert:

For entire reimbursement of Thomas W. Palmer for moneys paid by him for labor and expenses incurred in the preparation of a final report as president of the World's Columbian Exposition, as required by section 13 of the act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, approved April 25, 1890, $1,998.35.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, after line 16, to insert:

Life-Saving Service: Authority is hereby granted the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for commutation of quarters for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service the sum of $5,160, or so much thereof as may be required, the same to be paid from the regular annual appropriation for the Life-Saving Service for the fiscal year 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "War Department," on page 10, after line 22, to insert:

Battle lines and sites for tablets at Antietam: For completing the improvement of the roads owned by the United States at Antietam, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 21, to insert:

Horses for cavalry and artillery: Purchase of horses for the cavalry and artillery and for the Indian scouts, and for such infantry and members of the hospital corps in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, $30,000: Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number on hand, shall not at any time exceed the number of enlisted men and Indian scouts in the mounted service, and that no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster's Department and an inspection by such department, all under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 22, to insert:

Back pay and bounty: For payment of amounts for arrears of pay of two and three year volunteers that may be certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury during the fiscal year 1896, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 7, to insert:

Navy-yard at Brooklyn, N. Y.: For completion of dry dock No. 3, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 9, to insert:

Naval War College and Torpedo School, Coasters Harbor Island, Rhode Island: For repairs to roof of college building, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interior Department," on page 13, after line 13, to insert:

For the Capitol: For work at Capitol and for general repairs thereof, including wages of mechanics and laborers, $10,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 16, to insert:

Government Hospital for the Insane: For completing electric plant for lighting and ventilating, $19,349.64.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 22, to insert:

For the renting of additional rooms for the use of the engraving and printing division of the Geological Survey for a period of four months, beginning with the 1st day of March, $400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 8, to insert:

Payment for surveys of public lands: To pay F. W. Pettigrew for surveys executed by him and approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in excess of the limit allowed by his contract, No. 100, in the year 1894, $300.80.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of Justice," on page 16, line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "chief of accounting division, six" and insert "clerk in charge of accounts, two"; so as to make the clause read:

For additional salary of clerk in charge of accounts, $200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 11, to strike out:

For printing and binding for the Department of Justice, to be executed under the direction of the Public Printer, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Judicial," on page 17, line 3, after the word "attorneys," to insert "assistant district attorneys"; in the same line, after the word "marshals," to insert "deputy marshals," and in line 4, after the word "clerks," to insert "deputy clerks"; so as to make the clause read:

To pay the salaries and expenses of the judges, district attorneys, assistant district attorneys, marshals, deputy marshals, clerks, deputy clerks, commissioners, and constables of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, including the salary due James V. Walker, resigned, as district attorney of the central district of the Indian Territory from April 1, 1895, to July 8, 1895, inclusive, at the rate of $4,000 per annum. And the salary due Lucius L. Stowe, now deceased, as marshal of the southern district of the Indian Territory from April 3, 1895, to July 27, 1895, inclusive, at the rate of $4,000 per annum, being a deficiency to the appropriation for the service of the fiscal years 1895 and 1896, $210,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senate has now reached the appropriations in the bill which it seems to me are very large and some of them objectionable. I am not prepared to state, I will say to the Senator from Maine, that I wish to vote against the House provision of $210,000 for arrears of judicial expenses in the Indian Territory, although I think it is very large. I fear it is excessive. The estimate is contained on page 327 of the Book of Estimates for this year, Appendix J. The regular pay roll for that district is 3 judges, $15,000; 3 marshals, $12,000; 3 attorneys, $12,000; 3 clerks, $9,000; 10 deputy clerks, $12,000; 18 commissioners, $27,000; 12 regular deputy marshals, $14,000; 33 special deputy marshals, $39,600; 18 constables, $10,800; 1 clerk court of appeals, $1,200, making $152,600. Then there is an arrear for the quarter ending June 30, 1895, of $10,000. The estimate proceeds:

It is perhaps fair to suggest that for incidental expenses there will be needed at least $50,000. The total appropriation, therefore, which should be so worded as to include the salaries of constables, should be, from the above estimate, $210,600.

I see that the other House has adopted that estimate. I am led not to say that I oppose the appropriation because I find that the amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, in the last appropriation act was only $50,000. I take it, therefore, that the committees of the two Houses expected a deficiency; that it must be apparent either that the expenditures now proposed are enormously excessive, or else, when Congress, knowing that this new court of three districts in the Indian Territory had been created, appropriated only $50,000 for the service of the year, it was known that that sum would be entirely inadequate for the performance of the business of the courts in that district.

I do not know whether the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has any recollection upon that subject, as to whether $50,000 was appropriated by the last Congress when it was known that $260,000 would be needed, that amount being purposely left unappropriated, or whether the Senator has any recollection on the subject.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will be through on this point in one moment. I do not know, either, whether the Senator or the committee can give any information as to whether 12 regular deputy marshals, costing $14,000; 33 special marshals, costing $39,600, and 18 commissioners, costing $27,000—I hope the Senator will note the figures—are needed. The other House proposes these appropriations, the Senate committee acquiesces in them, and Congress now proposes to say to the officers of the United States courts in the Indian Territory that they can spend for these 18 commissioners $27,000, for these 12 regular deputy marshals $14,000, and for these 33 special deputy marshals $39,600.

I take it for granted that the salaries of the 3 judges, $5,000 each, $15,000, must be paid, of course. The 3 marshals, $4,000 each, $12,000, must be paid, being salaries. The 3 attorneys must be paid $4,000 each, $12,000. The 3 clerks, $3,000 each, making $9,000, and the 10 deputy clerks, $12,000, must be paid. But I ask the Senator from Maine whether there is any need of spending the $27,000 and the $14,000 and the $39,600, including also in addition 18 constables, $10,800?

The Senator will say that because that amount is appropriated it need not necessarily be expended. But I say to the Senator there is not one probability that that money will be saved.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me?

Mr. CHANDLER. In one moment. It will all be expended, because it is appropriated. It will be used up in some way. We may be entirely sure. Now I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. My recollection in regard to the matter (the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will correct me, however, if I am wrong) is that the act creating these courts also provided for a certain number of commissioners at a fixed salary of $1,500 each.

Mr. CHANDLER. Commissioners?

Mr. BERRY. Commissioners. It also provided for a certain number of deputy marshals at a fixed salary of probably $1,200 each. The proposed appropriations simply meet the requirements of that act for services already rendered by the parties under the law fixing the number of officers and the salaries to be paid.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. If all the sums I have read are for salaries, why did Congress appropriate only $50,000 to cover this $260,000 of expenses?

Mr. HALE. I can tell the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BERRY. As to why Congress did not appropriate more, I can only state what I remember as to what occurred at the time. The bill was passed very late in the session, just before the adjournment of the last Congress. There was no provision in the regular bill for the payment of any salaries. An effort was made on the House side to get an appropriation for the purpose. The committee in the other House put only $50,000 into the bill. It was so late in the session that it was impossible to correct it after the bill came here, though it was known here by all those who took any interest in the matter that that sum was wholly insufficient. Why the House did not put in any more than $50,000 I can not answer the Senator, because I do not know.

Mr. HALE. The act which is at the bottom of all this is the act of March 1, 1895, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of additional judges of the United States court in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes." That bill became a law March 1, 1895. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has said, it contained no appropriation of money to set the machinery on foot, and on the 2d of March the act to provide for the salaries of judges and other officers of the United States court in the Indian Territory was passed, which gave only $50,000, and which, of course, was nothing but guesswork.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does that act specify the salaries, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. HALE. No, it does not. The provisions for the appointment of judges, district attorneys, commissioners, deputy marshals, etc., are all contained in the original act, and not in the appropriation act. But if the Senator will examine that act he will find that all these are provided for, and the Department has gone on under the original act constituting this court with its surroundings.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the salaries of commissioners and deputy marshals are fixed in the original act creating the court.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what I should like to have the Senator from Maine state; whether the number and the salaries of the commissioners, the deputy clerks, the regular deputy marshals, the special deputy marshals, and the constables are provided for. Does the act state their number and compensation?

Mr. HALE. The judges, marshals, attorneys, deputy marshals, and clerks are provided for in that way. The provision as to commissioners is found in section 4.

That each judge of said court shall have the powers conferred by law upon the United States circuit courts to appoint commissioners within the district in which he presides, who, at the time of their appointment, shall be duly enrolled attorneys of some court of record of the United States or of some State, and shall be competent and of good standing, and shall be known as United States commissioners, but not exceeding six commissioners shall be appointed for any district hereinbefore constituted.

There are three districts, and then there are provisions about present commissioners, etc. But I do not know of anything——

Mr. BERRY. I am sure the Senator will find either in that act or the other the provision fixing the salary of commissioners at $1,500, and of deputy marshals at $1,200.

Mr. HALE. Yes, that is the case. It is found in section 5, in which the salaries of constables and other officers are fixed.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator read that section?

Mr. HALE. It is as follows:

Each of said constables shall receive a salary of $800 per annum. Each of said commissioners and constables shall keep a careful account of all fees, fines, and costs collected by him, and shall settle with and pay the same to the clerk of the district at the end of every quarter, who shall pay the same into the Treasury of the United States. Said commissioners and constables, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, shall execute to the United States, for the security of the public, a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $2,000, to be approved by the judge appointing him, conditioned that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his office and account for all moneys coming into his hands; and he shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to faithfully perform the duties required of him.

* * * * * * *

Each of said commissioners in said Territory shall receive a salary of $1,500 per annum, and all fees collected by him shall be paid over to the clerk of the district.

I have not read everything, but only that portion which is necessary to answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Of course this has been almost terra incognita to the Department of Justice. It was new, an experiment that Congress deliberately embarked in, and it cost a great deal of money. I do not wonder that the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire has been drawn to this matter, because it costs a great deal more than it was supposed it would. But there has been the need, as the Department believes, of all this force, this paraphernalia of justice, and the Department has done its best to keep down the expenditures. The committee can only say that, taking the representations of the Department, as the House of Representatives did, and as the committee of the Senate did, it believes that those provisions to the extent they are found in the bill are necessary. I could wish that they cost less money, and I could wish in the future that they may be restricted and perhaps lessened. But that is a matter that must be largely dealt with in the discretion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish the Senator from Maine to take notice of the fact that the words which he has read, "not exceeding," have had very little effect. When those judges were appointed, and two of them were ex-members of Congress, being left out of the present Congress, and went to the Indian Territory, they went with all the extravagant notions derived from residence for many years in Washington. They were not simple-minded, economical citizens of the Indian Territory or of the prudent and humble State of Arkansas, or of Texas adjoining; but they went with all the extravagant notions engendered by being members of a Democratic billion-dollar Congress.

When they came to appoint their officials, the words "not exceeding" imposed no limitations upon them. The Senator from Maine will notice 18 commissioners in the three districts, not exceeding 6 in each district. The whole 18 were appointed. There are 12 deputy marshals, regular. If the Senator will look, I think he will find that the act said "not exceeding 4 in each district." "Thirty-three deputy marshals;" the Senator will see that is nearly 9 for each district, and the words "not exceeding" are undoubtedly in the act. "Eighteen constables;" that is 6 in each district. So the judges appointed all that the law allowed them to do, and the total amount of expenses is to be incurred. When Congress adjourned the people had a right to expect—the Senator will not deny that—that the $50,000 would pay the expense of the courts in the Indian Territory.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the people generally, the sixty or seventy million people, knew much about it. I do not think that anybody who had anything to do with making the appropriation believed that $50,000 would carry this business through a year. It was thought that it might serve to run the courts until Congress met in December, and it was the hope, when that provision was made a law, that it would run them until December.

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly——

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly it did not. It was guesswork, as I have said.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is one of those cases where, imputing no special blame to anyone except as we are all to blame for the existence of this system, it was perfectly known except to the people. I will modify my expression as to what the people had a right to expect—because they had a right to expect nothing—but it was not known to the people (I suppose the Senator will not object to that form of expression) that this district for which $50,000 had been appropriated would cost $260,000 for its court expenses, yet the full limit of marshals, deputy marshals, and commissioners has been reached, and this amount of money will have to be paid.

Mr. President, I have not made these remarks without having some cause to complain of the expenditures in that district. I am not able at present certainly to make specific charges as to the method in which justice is being administered in that district, but I have heard complaints as to the expenditures there. I believe that the expenditures are extravagant and that all is not as it should be in that district.

Letters and oral suggestions have come to me in reference to the manner in which the court business is managed there, which lead me to believe that there is the same extravagance inaugurated in the Indian Territory in the management of the courts that clearly exists in various other parts of the country, and I make my suggestions in the hope that when the committee come to scrutinize the appropriations for the next fiscal year they will see to it that the appropriations are made specific; that they will make no more appropriations than are necessary for conducting the public business, and that the committee will, if possible, devise some means of making the appropriations which they grant in the regular bill last the year out, instead of being expended in the first six months of the year, Congress then being subjected to a demand for the doubling or the trebling of the appropriation for the succeeding six months in the year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 17, after line 18, to insert:

Court of Private Land Claims: That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $16,000 made for salaries and expenses of the Court of Private Land Claims in the legislative appropriation act approved July 31, 1894, is hereby continued available for the same purposes until June 30, 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 18, to insert:

For payment of fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, fiscal year 1895, $230,573.34.

Mr. CHANDLER. The appropriation for this item, marshals and deputies, as it comes to the Senate is $960,000. The Senate committee proposes to add for deficiencies for 1895, $230,572.34. I now take occasion to call attention again to the enormous increase, the constantly growing increase, in the expenses of the United States courts.

In the first place, the appropriation for the current fiscal year was $3,455,600. The House present appropriation is $3,006,000, making $6,461,600. I speak now of the total appropriations for United States courts. The Senate adds $299,000, making the courts of the United States for the current year, if no additional deficiency is appropriated for, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says there will undoubtedly be a further deficiency to provide for, cost the sum of $6,760,600.

The Attorney-General calls attention to this growing increase of the expenses of the United States courts. In the criticisms that I make I intend no reflection upon the Committee on Appropriations of this body, nor do I propose to make any remarks derogatory to the past or the present administration of the Department of Justice in Washington. I have no doubt the late Attorney-General and the present Attorney-General have been anxious to keep down expenses, but in spite of all that the heads of the Department of Justice have been able to accomplish the frightful increase in the expenses of the Department still goes on.

I read from the report of the present Attorney-General, submitted November 30, 1895:

The expenses of the Federal courts have steadily increased, as well as their business, as will appear by the following statement:

Fiscal year—		Total expenses.
1888		$3,864,898.15
1893		5,628,223.21
Incurred and paid in 1894	$4,551,373.61
Incurred in 1894 and paid in 1895	1,643,726.89
		6,195,100.50
Incurred and paid in 1895		5,412,718.91

And the Attorney-General adds in a note:

Amounts yet to be paid to be added as appropriations are available for two years after the year for which they are made.

The report of the House committee in charge of the bill, being Report No. 76, House of Representatives, present session, gives the amounts that they have inserted in the bill for United States courts as deficiencies at $3,242,582.19, and a table is given at the close of the report, headed "Appropriations for expenses of United States courts and deficiencies therefor, fiscal years 1885–1896," which I will insert in my remarks without reading the whole of it at this time:

Appropriations for expenses of United States courts and deficiencies therefor, fiscal years 1885–1896.

Regular appropriation for 1885	$2,760,000.00
Deficiencies	450,050.00
Regular appropriation for 1886	2,960,000.00
Deficiencies	560,266.00
Regular appropriation for 1887	2,904,400.00
Deficiencies	485,260.00
Regular appropriation for 1888	2,849,400.00
Deficiencies	1,024,728.00
Regular appropriation for 1889	3,505,600.00
Deficiencies	359,219.00
Regular appropriation for 1890	3,575,600.00
Deficiencies	1,156,289.00
Regular appropriation for 1891	3,616,600.00
Deficiencies	1,423,900.00
Regular appropriation for 1892	3,739,100.00
Deficiencies	1,391,123.00
Regular appropriation for 1893	3,330,600.00
Deficiencies	2,177,860.00
Regular appropriation for 1894	3,345,000.00
Deficiencies	2,758,402.00
Regular appropriation for 1895	3,595,000.00
Deficiencies	2,653,200.00
Regular appropriation for 1896	3,455,600.00
Amount in accompanying bill:
For 1896	3,006,000.00
For 1895	180,238.12
For 1894	35,837.21

But going back to 1885, we have the regular appropriation, $2,760,000 and the deficiencies $450,050, making about $3,300,000. Now, ten years after, we have the amounts doubled already, making over $6,000,000 that is to be provided for when the bill passes, and we have the assurance of the Senator from Maine that that will not be the total appropriation—that there will undoubtedly be a further deficiency to provide for. So it is probable that the court expenses for the present fiscal year, instead of being a little over $3,000,000, as they were ten years ago, will be about $8,000,000.

I submit that Congress should take this subject into careful consideration, and see what the difficulty is and whether a remedy can be applied. It is folly to say that there has been any such natural increase of business as would produce these increased expenditures. The business of the United States in United States courts is not three times as great in 1896 as it was in 1886. It is to be borne in mind that this is only the expenses of United States business. This appropriation does not include the salaries of the judges, and in addition to the United States litigation, criminal and civil, is the large amount of civil business in causes between party and party which is done in United States courts.

There has been an increase of legitimate business, I know, but no such increase as that to which I have called attention. I read from the Attorney-General's report:

Great vigilance has been exercised and every effort made to keep down the expenses connected with the Federal courts. Excessive and illegal charges can in some measure be avoided by watchfulness and laborious investigation, but arrests and prosecutions on frivolous charges and flimsy proof, to which part of these expenses is due, can not be prevented by this Department. This can be accomplished only by abolishing the system which, by making the fees of commissioners, marshals, clerks, and attorneys the source of their compensation, presents a constant inducement to unnecessary arrests and litigation.

The 40 per cent of unsuccessful prosecutions during the past year, which is less than usual, does not, of course, include the cases wherein persons arrested are discharged on preliminary hearing, or those wherein the charges are ignored by grand juries. Not only do the fees of commissioners, and those of marshals and witnesses, with mileage, in these cases, cause a large annual expense to the Government, but annoyance and loss of time are inflicted on those involved as parties and witnesses which indirectly work both material and moral injury to the public. Besides, a class of professional witnesses and informers grows up in many sections, to the scandal of the administration of justice.

The Attorney-General calls special attention to some frauds in connection with the business of the United States courts in the State of Alabama. I do not see either of the Senators from Alabama in the Chamber, but I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read the clause in brackets which I have marked in the report of the Attorney-General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The discovery in northern Alabama of a widespread conspiracy among commissioners and deputy marshals to defraud the Government by means of fraudulent charges of fees, and the recent conviction of such of the conspirators as failed to escape, only call renewed attention in a striking way to the evils of the fee system.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now ask the Secretary to read the marked passages in brackets in Report No. 76, to which I have alluded, made in the House of Representatives January 20, 1896, beginning with the words "This exhibit" and reading to the end of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

This exhibit shows for the period named a growth in the expenses of this branch of the public service of more than 100 per cent. The expenses for fees of United States commissioners have grown from $127,150 for the fiscal year 1889 to $340,000 for the current year, and the fees of witnesses have increased from $900,000 in 1889 to $1,500,000 for the current year.

That these expenditures are abnormal and that some reform in the law should be instituted the committee are well satisfied; but under the rules of the House they have no power in the premises other than to recommend the appropriations which are necessary to meet the demands of this branch of the public service as they arise under existing law, and to express the earnest hope and recommendation that the proper committee or committees of the House will take up the matter without delay during this session, with a view to the enactment of proper legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Coming now to the pending bill, I have in my hand a table which I will insert in the RECORD, showing what has been done in reference to the year 1896 and what is proposed to be done. The regular appropriation for the whole year for the fees of marshals, it appears by this table, was $675,000. The House of Representatives now insert in the pending bill a deficiency of $960,000. I desire the especial attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], as well as of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] who is conversing with him, to this point. Here is a deliberately made appropriation of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the last Congress, participated in by the Committee on Appropriations, participated in by the Senator from Maine, by the Senator from Colorado, by myself as a member of this body, and $675,000 was appropriated for the fees of marshals. The other House now insert in this bill a deficiency of $960,000, and the Senate committee propose to add $230,000 more. Now, I ask the Senators who are members of the Committee on Appropriations whether that is the way to do the public business.

Mr. HALE. No, it is not. Undoubtedly it is not. I referred to this matter before. It is a bad way. It comes from the other body. They did not last year claim or assert that the appropriations made for the purposes indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire would carry the Department through the year or even through half of the year; but the claim was that it might carry them around to December, and that then it could be supplemented by a deficiency appropriation bill. I think that is a very bad way, Mr. President.

Mr. CHANDLER. We had in possession of the Government a President committed to stand by the interests and promote the welfare of the common people; we had a House of Representatives elected in the interest of reform; and we had a Senate of the United States the appropriations of which were controlled by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] who I see in his seat, as he always is. That reform Congress decided that $675,000 was money enough for the marshals' fees of the United States courts for the whole year; and now the House of Representatives is obliged to add $960,000 to the marshals' fees for the current year, and the Senate committee, composed of the ablest Senators and embodying the best thought of the Senate, propose to add $230,573.34 to this appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I want to know why this is so. I want to hear from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] as well as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] on this subject before this $960,000 plus $230,000 is swallowed by the Senate, which I trust will in the present Congress show some measure of reform.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask——

Mr. CHANDLER. I see the Senator from Nebraska is looking eagerly at me. After I hear from him I will be glad to hear from the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator tell me what he wants me to state.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Hampshire uses the expression "the best thought," which has a strangely familiar sound here. I thought I would ask him whether he meant the best thought, which is represented of course on both sides of this Chamber, upon the money question or upon questions of domestic economy.

Mr. CHANDLER. The question puzzles me, Mr. President. I will think it over and answer at length to-morrow. Now I will yield to the Senator from Missouri, if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand exactly what the Senator from New Hampshire desired me to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want the Senator to state whether it was wise legislation to appropriate $675,000 for fees of marshals for the whole year and now to appropriate $960,000 plus $230,000 as a deficiency. Is that the way to appropriate money for United States courts?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know whether there was any wisdom in it or not. It is hard to tell. It is all we could get at the last session. It is all that would be allowed at that session.

Mr. CHANDLER. Why so? Why was not the Senate asked to appropriate the proper amount, unless $675,000 was enough?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate appropriated as nearly all that was desired as it could get.

Mr. CHANDLER. The estimate was $1,400,000. The Senator was chairman of the committee, and he let Congress go away after having appropriated $675,000—less than one-half the estimate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; there is no question about that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Could not the Senator help that?

Mr. COCKRELL. Help it! I have not yet been able to find a way to coerce those who differ from you and have equal power with you.

Mr. CHANDLER. I thought the Senator did that frequently.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have never yet been able to do it. I should be delighted to know how it can be done. There are some stubborn and rebellious men here in the Senate on the silver question whom I would like to coerce and have them do something that was reasonable and just.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will accomplish more with me in that direction by coercion than persuasion.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, no; the whole truth of the matter is that there was the estimate; the committee in the Senate increased the appropriation, and in conference it would not be agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, that is what we are confronted with to-day. Six hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated for the marshals, and it has gone. The other House now proposes to give them $960,000 more, and the banner of reform having been transferred from the other side of the Chamber to this side of the Chamber, it is now proposed by the Senate committee to add $230,000. Mr. President, for one I am going to vote against that addition of $230,000 if I vote alone, and I should like to vote against the appropriation of $960,000.

There was appropriated for attorneys' fees $250,000, and it is now proposed to appropriate $160,000 and $57,000 and $14,000, as will appear by the table, as a deficiency. The clerks were allowed by the bill of the reform Congress $175,000. The deficiency appropriation is $155,000, and for 1895, $38,000, and for 1894, $10,000, and the Senate committee propose to add $19,000 more, making all together, as in the case of the marshals' fees, more deficiency than the original appropriation.

Now, we come to the commissioners' fees, and I want the special attention of the Senator from Maine to the situation of the commissioners' fees. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] will allow me to have the attention of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CHANDLER. First I had to call off the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and now the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and I want the junior Senator from Colorado to see this. We appropriated $100,000 for commissioners' fees for 1896. Now the other House proposes to appropriate $240,000 for a deficiency, and $71,000, and $11,000, and $3,902.65. Now, I ask the two Senators if that is the way to do business.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the conviction that the Senator from New Hampshire has forced upon me is to rise in indignant protest at his statement a few moments ago that the Committee on Appropriations embody either the best thought or the most thought in the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has himself recently maintained that they embody the great bulk of wisdom and ought to have substantially all the power of the Senate.

We appropriated $600,000 for jurors' fees. We are now called upon to appropriate $200,000 more for jurors' fees. We appropriated $750,000 for witnesses' fees. The proposed deficiency appropriation in the bill as passed by the House is $750,000. We appropriated for the support of prisoners $275,000, and the deficiency appropriation is $365,000. Take bailiffs and criers. We appropriated $150,000, and the deficiency is $70,000. The table is as follows:

	Regular estimate for the whole year ending June 30, 1896.	Regular appropriation for the whole year.	Present House deficiency bill gives—	Senate committee's increase.
Fees of marshals	$1,400,000	$675,000	$960,000.00	*$230,573.34

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine asked very properly: What is the remedy; what does the Senator from New Hampshire propose as a remedy? Of course, in view of all these excessive expenditures, as they have taken place in recent years, there have been under consideration bills for paying salaries to the district attorneys and the marshals instead of fees, but those bills have made no progress. I remember the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] reported a bill fixing the salaries for district attorneys, and if I am correctly informed, after the bill came into the Senate the Senator from Missouri was obliged to submit to increases of the salaries proposed by him all along the line, until finally, when the bill was overwhelmed by increases, the Senator from Missouri abandoned it, and we have heard no more from him. If we wait until by legislation fixing salaries and regulating the fees we succeed in reducing these expenses down to a proper point, we shall wait in vain. The men who are interested in this iniquitous fee system will manage to bring influences to bear upon you, Mr. President, and myself, and the other Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and upon the House of Representatives, and they will block all measures of reform in this direction.

Therefore it is time, as it seems to me, to bring about reform here by refusing to appropriate for some of these deficiencies; and I myself believe that a most effectual remedy could be administered by this Congress by refusing to appropriate for the deficiencies for the compensation of the district attorneys and the marshals. I would not advise refusing to appropriate for the fees of the jurors or the fees of the witnesses. Mr. President, they are not to blame. The jurors are summoned by order of the court; the witnesses are summoned by order of the court; and, although the deficiency for witnesses' fees is reported as being more than the whole allowance for the year, I suppose the fees will have to be paid, and the jurors' fees, which are a third larger than the regular appropriation, will have to be paid.

But, Mr. President, these enormous expenses are caused by a negligent administration of their offices by the district attorneys and the marshals. Fictitious and useless and unnecessary prosecutions are gotten up by district attorneys and by marshals; and the way to put an end to the unnecessary litigation, which is promoted and fostered by the district attorneys and the marshals, and for which they are responsible, is to refuse to appropriate for the deficiencies for the district attorneys and the marshals. I sincerely hope that the Committee on Appropriations will be willing in some portion of this bill to apply that drastic remedy, which I conceive is the only way in which the extravagances which are growing up in the conduct of the business of the courts of the United States can be restricted and put down.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can perhaps assist the Senator in trying to reach——

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to say to the Senator before he speaks that I have heard the same complaints made in reference to the administration of justice in the courts of the United States in South Carolina that exist in reference to Alabama, that there have been fictitious prosecutions there, and litigation gotten up and promoted for the purpose of increasing the fees of officers. I have no data on the subject. I hope the Senator from South Carolina can assist me in that direction.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not being a lawyer, I have no facts except that two or three weeks ago I noticed in one of our State papers a very strong presentation by the district judge in his charge to the grand jury, or in some remarks to the grand jury, in regard to the abuses which are bringing about this enormous increase in expenditures. He charged the commissioners as being perhaps more responsible for it than anybody else, because if the marshal desires to institute proceedings—fictitious proceedings, you might say; those under color of justice, indeed, but merely to get a fee—unless the commissioner is in collusion he will throw the case out; he will not summon the witnesses, and will not bind the party over to court. Necessarily the commissioner and the marshal and the district attorney, perhaps all three working in collusion, bring about this condition, where the public money is wasted on witnesses. I have seen them around our courts there. They are habitual witnesses. I have known of them. They make their living that way. They go about over the country and try to bamboozle this negro or that into buying a bottle of whisky, and then they get the thing up and carry a whole team of negroes up to court, and get $2 a day, or whatever the fee is that the witnesses are paid. If you will pardon me, I do not intend any insinuation, or accusation of imbecility, or anything of that kind, but when you get up here and say that you do not know what to do, and try to put the burden on the Appropriations Committee, and say that they ought to stop recommending appropriations to pay this money, when the law permits it, I think is a confession that——

Mr. TELLER and others. Of imbecility.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I think the Judiciary Committee ought to take hold of this matter, or some Senator, and bring in a bill here that would give us a system of salaries instead of the fees.

Mr. HALE. That is just what ought to be done. The Senator has it right.

Mr. TILLMAN. As long as we had trial justices in our State——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me?

Mr. TILLMAN. In one minute, as soon as I make the point. As long as we had trial justices in our State, that being the system—in other words, when they were paid by the case—our dockets were kept burdened with cases against negroes for stealing this chicken and having that little rumpus or fight, or something of that sort. In self-defense, to keep from being bankrupted by court expenses, we simply gave those fellows a fixed salary, and said, "Here, you will get so much for the criminal business and you will not get any more." Then when anybody came to one of the trial justices and said that John Jones and Tom Smith had a fight, he would say, "Let them fight it out; I have got nothing to do with them. If you want a warrant, come up here and swear it out." He would not send a crowd around to hunt up all these little cases. So I say you can not do anything with this matter until you fix the salaries here and make it to the interest of these men not to have litigation rather than to have it, because, unless they get a fee out of it, they will not want to do the work.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say, since the question has been raised, that the Committee on the Judiciary has this question before it now. The chairman is not present, but I recollect that at the last meeting he stated that at the next meeting of the committee he should bring up the subject of fees as a special subject for consideration. I wish to say to Senators, however, that it is a very difficult question to determine what the salary should be in all the different marshals' districts, and what the salary of the commissioners should be and the salary of the clerks. It is no small job, as Senators will find out when the bill is presented here. I have no doubt that every Senator on this floor will find fault with the bill when it is brought in and insist that it is not a proper bill for his State; it may be all right for some other State.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what we all did before when the Senator from Missouri had his bill up.

Mr. TELLER. We had the same experience before in trying to adopt a different system, but we are still at it, and I suppose in due time we shall bring in a bill, and then I will expect the Senator from New Hampshire and other Senators to insist that there has been a great lack of judgment in regard to fixing salaries on the part of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to criticise the conduct of anyone in respect to appropriations. I believe that the present system of dealing with our appropriations is probably more expensive and faulty than that of any other parliamentary government. The manner in which our appropriations is made is a very loose one. The Secretary of the Treasury is required by existing law to submit to Congress at the beginning of each session estimates for the ensuing fiscal year. In the English Government this is called the budget.

Although we do not often like to cite the systems of other Governments as superior to our own, yet the system of the English Government in dealing with appropriations is infinitely better than ours. What is called the budget is made upon the responsibility of ministers who hold that office at the pleasure of Parliament. Nobody deals with the estimates but the House of Commons. The House of Lords are not even allowed to cross a "t" or dot an "i." There is no appropriation bill that passes between the two Houses. The appropriations are dealt with by the House of Commons.

The budget of England is taken up in its ordinary course. It is made up in the most scientific manner, giving details not only of the expenditures for the coming year, but of the expenditures of the past year, and giving it in a simple, brief form; it shows the amounts and gives the figures, but not in a long document or bill such as is now introduced in Congress. Indeed, when I entered Congress as a member of the House of Representatives there was but one bill appropriating money; that was called the appropriation bill. The appropriations have since been divided into I do not know how many bills—ten, twelve, or thirteen. Then there are deficiency appropriation bills, which very rarely occurred at that time.

To consider the English budget the House of Commons would meet at an earlier hour than usual, only forty being required to attend to form a quorum, and they were generally persons connected with the financial affairs of the Government. They went over the various items one by one and they put down so many pounds, shillings, and pence for each particular item. That was carried through in committee of the House of Commons, and they rarely changed the appropriations. It was only under certain circumstances that they added to or deducted from the appropriations that were made, and those changes were noted in the budget. The budget at the close of its consideration was then reprinted. Thereupon an act of Parliament was passed, embracing probably a single page of printed matter, in which the House of Commons placed at the service of Her Majesty the Queen and her ministers this budget.

In a simple law of probably one page the different parts of the budget were contained. I have one of them here before me, showing the character in which they are made up. This is what is called the civil budget. Then they had the military budget and the naval budget. This is the precise form. [Exhibiting.] This budget shows not only the particular expense to be provided for, but the amount given for the current year, the amount for the coming year, and so on. It is simply this estimate that was enacted into a law of about one page or two pages. If there was to be any special legislation attached to the budget on account of the appropriations made by the budget that legislation was given. I have myself seen many of these. Therefore the acts of a session of Parliament of Great Britain would probably be contained in a thin pamphlet of 40, 50, or 60 pages. Those acts are carried into public laws of Great Britain. They do not publish the estimates in the laws.

The great objection now to our statutes is that more than two-thirds of the space is occupied in the printing of appropriations, when, as a matter of course, the appropriations made for one year at the end of the following year are of no account whatever; and yet we publish all the items in detail, and put them in our great folios, and thus cause an enormous deal of expense in printing and distributing the laws. If you take up the acts of a Parliament you will find that they are contained in a comparatively small volume. If you take up the acts of one of our sessions you will find it a great volume, simply because we print all these items in detail in the form of laws, all interest in which disappears in the course of twelve months.

Mr. President, this controversy between the two Houses is very unfortunate. As a matter of course, the Senate can not surrender its power to amend appropriation bills. The Senate has precisely the same power to originate and prepare appropriation bills as has the House of Representatives, and there is no provision of the Constitution which imposes any restraint upon the Senate in dealing with appropriation bills precisely as it deals with all other subjects of legislation. But the very fact that these two Houses are generally watchful of each other, and sometimes are controlled by opposing parties—the House withholding appropriations which are necessary to be made and forcing the Senate to consider and act upon them—engenders controversy and collision, until finally the controversy appears before a committee of conference, where, sometimes, great difficulties arise and large subjects may be stricken out or large appropriations may be added.

I do not know precisely the way in which this can be corrected, but my own idea would be that the Secretary of the Treasury should give specifically in his estimates of appropriation every item of expenditures approved by him, and that book ought to be the basis of the action of the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses. The figures recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, who represents the executive department of the Government, of course should be subject to change, at their pleasure, by the House of Representatives, and items added to or taken from it. That budget, with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, ought then to be sent to the Senate, and there additions may be made either in the amount of appropriations or in new appropriations or in reducing the old appropriations. The whole would be shown as in the English budget, contained in the book I hold in my hand, and all of the laws relating to appropriations could be then transferred to the general laws of the United States, where they would not fill the space that ought to be reserved for the ordinary legislation of the country.

I have often conversed on this subject with my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE], who, I believe, agrees with me in every respect, and also with my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. They concur with me that this is a very difficult question to deal with. But, in my judgment, the Appropriations Committee could not do a greater act of wisdom or a greater act of utility to the Congress of the United States than by adopting substantially the English system in the mode and manner of making up their appropriations. If that were done the people of the United States could see exactly how much the executive department had recommended to be appropriated for certain purposes, and they could see how much the House of Representatives had authorized for such purposes, and then what the Senate did on the same subjects; and each branch would be responsible for their action as to the recommendations contained in the budget.

It seems to me that some such method, which could be easily adopted, would save an enormous sum of money now expended in printing the appropriation bills, with the long array of figures, which are not printed in Arabic numerals, but by letters; and this has to be repeated over and over again, because when a bill is reported to the House it will probably be amended, and then reprinted, and when it comes to the Senate it will probably be amended and be printed more than once, and finally carried, with all its multitudinous details, to the great volume of which I have spoken.

This is all wrong; and if the English system of the budget were adopted by Congress in substance, not perhaps in form, that budget to go through the two Houses of Congress, it would save enormous expense. The people could then see who were responsible for unnecessary expenditures or insufficient expenditures; they could see what the executive department had recommended, what the House of Representatives had recommended, and what the Senate had recommended, and then the action of the separate bodies, who must concur in the making of a law, and each of these bodies could be held responsible by the people of the United States. In my judgment the expenditures of the Government of the United States for the past ten or fifteen years have been far beyond the necessary requirements of the public service, and I say that with full knowledge——

Mr. COCKRELL. And yet the appropriations made by Congress have been every year from twenty to thirty million dollars below the estimates of the executive branch.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that, but the executive department does not bind the Senator or anybody else here. I should be glad, indeed, to see published in the budget all these different details, so as to show who is responsible for unnecessary expenditures.

Mr. CULLOM. Does not the Treasury Department now practically make out what might be called a budget, that is to say, does not that Department report to Congress the estimates of appropriations desired by the Government in the different branches of the public service? So the country can now see what the Administration recommends and what each House of Congress recommends by the passage of appropriation bills. Therefore I am not sure that if the system suggested by the Senator should be adopted it would be any clearer to the public as to exactly what each House had done and what the Administration had recommended.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend is mistaken in his conclusion. This document is not seen by 100 people outside of the Halls of Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. Suppose the Administration were required to make up what the Senator calls a budget, how would the people generally get to see that?

Mr. SHERMAN. They would get to see that because that budget would be followed by the action of the House of Representatives and of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Is not that so now to a great extent?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. The English budget is carried through until it is embodied in the law. All the appropriations in the budget are made by the action of the House of Commons, according to the English system, but in our form of government the action of the two bodies would be shown in the budget, and their action would be printed in tabulated form in this way. [Exhibiting.]

Mr. CULLOM. I have seen that.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the essential difference between the English budget the Senator has in his hand and the United States Book of Estimates which the Senator from Illinois possesses?

Mr. SHERMAN. The budget is sent very much in this form [exhibiting], and it is only in slight matters changed. Here is the form of the budget as it appears and as it has been acted upon, together with the amount appropriated for the same object the preceding year. So that in England they have a much fuller account of what is done than have we.

I do not wish to find fault, but in my judgment the whole manner of making appropriations is unnecessarily expensive and involves the public in a large loss.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I am for any reforms that can be adopted consistent with safe legislation, and I agree with the Senator that there is very much printing done which ought to be avoided. The printing of appropriation acts in the statutes of the country, to be generally circulated, seems to me to involve a very large expenditure which might be dispensed with, but I am not very clear that the system which has been adopted and acted upon for a good many years in this country is not very nearly as good as the system of the British Government referred to by the Senator. Each Department of the Government makes out its estimates of the amounts that will be required in its judgment for the different branches of the service under its control, and those estimates are sent to the Appropriations Committees of Congress. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, I know those estimates have been the basis of the action of the committee in all matters for which estimates are made by the Government. We do not follow the estimates in every case, and as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has said, the estimates of the Government are always very many millions beyond what the Congress of the United States finally appropriates for the different subjects which we are called upon to provide for, but if any improvement can be made in the system now in vogue I shall be entirely willing to favor it, as I said at the outset.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is probably my own fault that I am not able to appreciate the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. If I understand him, he advocates appropriations in bulk, as is done in the English Parliament. It has been my impression, derived from an experience of some years in this body, that the only safety in the way of appropriations is in segregating the bills and giving as close scrutiny as possible to each item. If we desire to make limitless appropriations we should adopt the system of appropriation in bulk, and then Senators could absolve themselves from individual responsibility by throwing it entirely upon the Appropriations Committee.

I do not appreciate the statement of the Senator that there is anything in the appropriation bills or estimates kept from the public. Any intelligent man at the close of any session, and even during the session, can see what has been the action of both Houses. There are tabulated statements at the end of every session showing what the House of Representatives has done and what the Senate has done, and which body has increased or decreased appropriations. There is also a book of estimates furnished to every committee that has appropriations to make; for instance, to the Committee on Commerce as to the river and harbor bill, and the Committee on Appropriations as to the other appropriation bills, which shows what each Department thinks it requires to carry on its special business. There are also explanations given, and, if necessary, the head of a Department can be called before the committee in order to make his statement and defend what might be called his budget.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. HALE. As a part of the book of appropriations the very thing to which the Senator is referring is found every year. The bills from each House, the amount they carry, the additions which are made, the new salaries which are established, the reductions, and everything are found, as the Senator says, in that book, which is furnished to every member.

Mr. VEST. I so understand, Mr. President. I have never served upon the Appropriations Committee, but I have been a member of the Committee on Commerce since I have been in the Senate, and I know that is the unvarying custom in regard to the river and harbor bill, which gives rise to so much contention.

There is another feature of the British system about which we have had some discussion in this Chamber, notably by the late minister to Germany, formerly our colleague, Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio—the feature which enables cabinet officers to appear before the legislative body and defend their appropriations. It has never been adopted in the United States, and I am not prepared to say whether it would be a suitable reform or not. But that is foreign to the present discussion.

I rose principally to express my gratification that the attention of Congress has been called to the great abuse of the fee system. I was for some years a member of the Judiciary Committee, and I devoted myself with great zeal and some little industry to preparing bills giving salaries to district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of Federal courts, instead of the present iniquitous and outrageous fee system. After long endeavor, I succeeded in having one bill reported to the Senate. That was a bill fixing salaries for district attorneys, as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and I found that in almost every district the salary was thought to be too small, although it had been estimated by the Attorney-General of the United States during President Harrison's Administration after careful examination and report. When that bill reached the Senate, I will not say every Senator, but I am almost prepared to say a majority of the body, offered amendments increasing the salaries of their respective district attorneys until the bill lost all shape and form as it had been reported, and I must say that I lost all faith in the bill. Since that time I have at every session during five Congresses introduced similar bills, and they are now pending before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and I am glad to say are receiving the attention of both committees.

I could detain the Senate until my strength was exhausted, and certainly their patience, by giving instances of the abuse of the fee system, derived from testimony furnished by judges of the United States courts, and I have sent those letters to the Committee on the Judiciary. It has become a regular system of plunder and robbery, and the language is not too strong. There is a little coterie around every district court—I will not say every one, perhaps, but all with which I have any acquaintance in the West—of deputy marshals, hangers-on, creatures who subsist by dragging poor, ignorant men under pretended charges before commissioners who belong to the ring. They are then sent to jail in a distant town and kept there until everything they have goes into this maelstrom of official corruption. I have now in my committee room, received this morning in my mail, a letter from a man who I know to be as honest a man as lives, who lives in southeastern Missouri, whose little estate has been swallowed up under a charge that he had trespassed upon public lands of the United States. He was dragged 250 miles, put into jail, forced to employ a lawyer, made to pay exorbitant fees, and finally permitted to go out after all that he had was taken away from him and with a debt against him of over $300. This thing is not only of weekly, but of daily occurrence, and no district judge can prevent it. My old law partner is now the district judge of the western district of Missouri, and I have had a letter from him, which I sent to the Judiciary Committee, and I have conversed with him frequently with regard to it. He says he scrutinizes every item in those cost bills, cuts them down as far as he can, yet he can not prevent it, because those marshals are interested in making a case or a pretended case, the commissioners are interested in binding the man over, and the clerks are interested in keeping it in court, until at last the poor alleged criminal is turned out a bankrupt.

It is not only a crying outrage, but it is a standing reproach to the Congress of the United States that we permit this thing to go on, and I am exceedingly glad to know that others concur with me in the necessity for immediate action.

There is another thing we must get rid of, and I will refer to it now. The courts in the Indian Territory cost more than any other courts in the United States. I do not know—and I was about to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, when he was addressing the Senate, if he could tell from the report of the Attorney-General, which I have not examined this year—what is the cost of those courts.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator that that point was discussed on the first clause on page 17 of the bill. For the expenses of the courts $50,000 was appropriated, and the deficiency was $210,000, making a total of $260,000.

Mr. LODGE. They cost more than any other courts in the United States.

Mr. VEST. Two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, then.

Mr. CHANDLER. For the year.

Mr. VEST. I should like the Senator to turn to the southern district of New York, embracing Brooklyn and the city of New York. I do not know what was the cost there this year, but heretofore the Indian Territory courts have cost more than the courts for the southern district of New York. If anybody wants to see this marshal system completely illustrated, let him go to the Indian Territory, where it is a trade, a vocation—not a profession, for it does not rise to that dignity, but an ordinary vocation—to drag men hundreds of miles in order to take from them these fees.

Mr. PLATT. When we were discussing the courts last year I examined this question and discovered that about one-third of the entire expenses of the Government for criminal prosecutions was expended in the Indian Territory. I do not know what is the amount for the past year.

Mr. VEST. That has been the result of my observation of the reports of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. The courts in the Indian Territory at this time are on the salary system, and not on the fee system.

Mr. VEST. Of the western district of Arkansas?

Mr. BERRY. In the Indian Territory, of which the Senator spoke, they have been on the salary system this last year.

Mr. FRYE. The marshals are not salaried, are they?

Mr. BERRY. The deputy marshals are salaried. The commissioners, the marshals, and the district attorneys each receive a salary under a bill which was passed at the last session of Congress. I have not the figures with me, but I will go to the Attorney-General's Office in the morning and get them. I am informed by Judge Stuart, who was the judge of the court out there, but who recently resigned, that the cost under the salary system in the Indian Territory, with thirty-odd marshals, amounts to more than the cost of about 200 marshals while it was under the fee system, and the records of the Attorney-General's Office show it.

Mr. VEST. How is it for the western district of Arkansas?

Mr. BERRY. They are under the fee system, as they always have been.

Mr. VEST. How about the costs in that court this year?

Mr. BERRY. I have not looked at that. I was speaking of the courts in the Indian Territory. I will state that I have not the report, but I was so informed by Judge Stuart. I shall, however, call on the Attorney-General and get the official figures, and if I have made an incorrect statement, I shall correct it.

Mr. VILAS. By permission of the Senator from Missouri, I will say that a bill is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary in which it is proposed to restore in part to the Indian Territory the fee system with reference to marshals. By the bill which was adopted last year, after a great deal of consideration, salaries were provided for marshals, and it has turned out practically that the system is very inefficient, and at least as expensive as the fee system. A subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary has had the subject under consideration, and have heard Judge Stuart and others in relation to it, and a bill will be before long reported in which an effort will be made to combine the two systems, with the hope that both economy and efficiency will be better secured.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, if you give to the judges the unlimited power of appointment or to the marshals with the approval of the judges, it is no reform at all. I supposed that I had something to do, in an advisory way anyhow, in regard to the bill as to the jurisdiction of the courts in the Indian Territory, and that we had limited the number of marshals. Perhaps we put the limit at too large a number.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. My recollection is that the statement of Judge Stuart was that under the present salary system there are fewer deputy marshals provided for, and that those salaries have cost more this year than about 200—I will not state the number specifically—deputy marshals cost under the fee system. If that is not correct I will correct it when I get the figures to-morrow from the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. VEST. When I speak of the courts in the Indian Territory I mean to include the court having jurisdiction in that Territory which is located at Fort Smith.

Mr. PALMER. That has been taken away.

Mr. VEST. I understand it has been; but I spoke of the expenses as they had been. I remember very well that we have taken away that jurisdiction, and an attempt is being made, as I understand, to restore it. Great complaint has been made of the legislation had by Congress; but, in any event, there is no question, if we take the statements of the United States judges and of intelligent and honest lawyers, that the fee system is a reproach and scandal to the jurisprudence of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, it is evident, I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill, that we can not finish it to-night, and I ask him to give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4785) to incorporate the National University;

A bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of medical colleges in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 5490) to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 5731) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 98) directing the Secretary of War to cause Lieut. Col. Jared A. Smith, Corps of Engineers, to submit a plan and estimate for the further improvement of Conneaut Harbor, in the State of Ohio, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved May 11, 1892," was read twice by its title.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that that bill may lie on the table and not be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the road of said company, under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, was read twice by its title.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that that bill may lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

BIRTHDAY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. HALE. I should like to have the Senate take up the bill providing for making the 12th day of February, the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, a national holiday. I ask that it may be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1999) to provide for the observance of the 12th day of February as a national holiday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HILL. I do not rise to object to that bill, although I had intended to propose an amendment to it. Under the peculiar circumstances in which it is presented now, I shall offer no opposition to it. The amendment I intended to propose I shall introduce as a separate bill, to create Jackson's birthday a national holiday.

Mr. HALE. I think it would be a fitting and perhaps a graceful thing that the bill should be passed to-day, this being the 12th of February.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not wish to come in ungraciously in this matter, I am sure, but I am opposed to creating any more national holidays. I think there is danger that we shall run into the extreme that we find in some countries, where there are so many saints' days that the people are seriously deprived of opportunities to work. I believe I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. HALE. Of course the bill can only be considered at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 13, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

(Continuation of legislative day of Tuesday, February 11, 1896.)

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 10.30 a. m. by the Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion now before the House, Representatives have repeatedly stated that they were friendly to silver, but that they could not vote for a concurrence in the Senate amendment; that they were bimetallists, but that they did not believe that bimetallism could be maintained by free coinage of silver. Those propositions, Mr. Speaker, are as irreconcilable to my mind as would be a proposition to advance the doctrines of Christianity by building a temple to Mahomet. If there is anything of benefit to the people, or of benefit to the progress of civilization, in the coinage of the white metal, it does not lie in the maintenance of the parity of that metal on the same basis that we maintain a paper circulation. It does not lie in the fact that we can maintain a silver dollar in circulation by reason of the redemption of that dollar with a gold dollar.

If there is any benefit to be derived from the future coinage of the silver dollar, it must be in the fact that it is recognized as one of the money metals of the world on equal terms with gold. For many centuries these two metals, gold and silver, have together, by reason of peculiar properties by which one became the complement of the other, assisted in solving the great economic problem of supplying money for the world, but to-day there are gentlemen upon the floor of this House who maintain that because in 1872 an ounce of silver was worth $1.29, and because to-day it has fallen to a valuation of 67½ cents, those countries that maintain a monometallic gold standard have won the victory and silver has passed out of circulation as one of the money metals of the world. They overlook the fact that with increasing trade and commerce there has arisen a greater demand for metallic money, and that the mistake by which the bond of union between the two metals was arbitrarily severed becomes more apparent every day.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposition that I believe and contend for is this: That although silver has been disgraced temporarily, that although it is no longer performing its functions as a money metal, the day will come, and is sure to come, when the world must once more recognize it in its proper function of making part of the money of the civilized world. I find from an examination of the figures that since 1493 there has been produced in the world only $8,500,000,000 of gold and $10,131,000,000 of silver. This gold and silver that was produced and has been coined into money of the world has disappeared to a great extent. It must be borne in mind that, although these metals seem to be imperishable, a dollar never passes from one hand to another but, by reason of the wearing of the coin, it loses part of its existence; that never a ship goes down at sea or a house burns down on land that does not destroy part of the coinage of the world.

Now, in our present civilization money is just as necessary to the onward movement of the wheels of civilization as it is necessary to oil the machinery of a great locomotive. In the first stages of the world's history men resorted to barter as a means of carrying on trade; but to-day money of some kind is absolutely necessary in order that the business of the world may go on.

The real question, Mr. Speaker, that is here for our consideration is a business question. It is not a question as to whether we are friendly to silver, whether we want to erect a temple and fall down and worship some particular metal, but it is a question as to whether we propose to do our duty to the people of the United States; whether we propose to put the money of this country on a safe and sound basis for the future; and if we propose to do that, Mr. Speaker, I contend that we must in the future recognize both of these metals as money units. If we fail to do so, then we must go to paper circulation and fiat money.

I find it stated by Mr. Muhleman in his work on the monetary systems of the world, which is considered good authority on this question, that there is at present in existence in the world $4,135,000,000 of gold; that the silver coinage of the world amounts to $4,494,000,000; that the uncovered paper circulation of the world amounts to $2,455,000,000. This makes the entire money of the world $11,084,000,000. That is the total amount of money in existence to transact the business of the world, containing a population of 1,450,000,000 of people. If we do not have sufficient money to facilitate the exchange of commodities, to that extent business must languish and stagnate. To illustrate: If ten thrashing machines will winnow the wheat of a single county, and it requires those ten machines to winnow the wheat for that entire county, and the work can not be done with a less number, then if you reduce the number of machines by one, leaving only nine, one-tenth of the wheat produced in that county must perish and be of no service to man. On the other hand, if the number of your machines remains stationary and your crop of wheat increases 10 per cent, then you can thrash only nine-tenths of the wheat raised in that county, and the other tenth must be left to destruction, and can not be used for the benefit of the community; and the same is true of business generally. Business is carried on by virtue of the ability of the business men of the world to obtain the money that is required to conduct their business. If there is a short supply of money in a country, or in the world at large, to that extent business interests must be hampered and prevented from expanding to the full extent to which they would otherwise. But, as I have shown, there is only about four billions of gold money in the whole world.

Now, if we go to a gold standard, if we propose to look to gold alone as the money metal of the world, it follows that we shall reduce our coin money more than one-half. I know it is contended, and contended by gentlemen here, that a large proportion of the business of the world is done on "confidence" money. Sir, I admit that it is; I admit that a great many of the business transactions of the world are settled with notes, with checks, with drafts, and, for the sake of the argument, I will admit that the contention of Mr. Muhleman is correct, and that 95 per cent of the business transactions of this country are settled not with money but with paper, or "confidence." But then the question arises, Is there enough gold to act as the other 5 per cent? Admitting that the theory of these gentlemen who contend for this confidence money is correct, it must be remembered that their theory is based on the proposition that we have the other 5 per cent in real money on which this confidence money is based.

Mr. Speaker, is there enough gold in the world to supply that 5 per cent of real money as a basis for this confidence money? I suppose that no one will contend that we have more money to-day in this country than we need. I take it that there is no gentleman here who will contend that we ought to contract the currency of the United States rather than expand it. To show how much money we need as a basis for this confidence money, I will call attention to the fact that from 1878 to 1892 the exchanges of the clearing houses of the United States increased from $27,814,000,000 to $62,109,000,000. In other words, there was an average increase of business, as shown by the clearing-house reports of this country, of over $2,500,000,000 a year within the period I have named. Now, of course that did not represent the entire expansion and increase of business in the United States. It represented merely the increase that is shown by the bank clearings, which was largely confined to the cities of this country. But admitting for the sake of the argument that these figures do show the expansion and increase of the business of the whole country, and admitting that 95 per cent of that new business is done on confidence, and that it requires only 5 per cent of real money to carry it on——

On motion of Mr. KENDALL, the time of Mr. UNDERWOOD was extended for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, to take up the chain of thought where I left off, if this increased business, averaging $2,500,000,000 a year, requires for its proper transaction a 5 per cent increase of coin money, then we shall require over $100,000,000 of new money in the United States every year to carry on this additional business. Now, where is the new money to come from if we do not coin silver? If we are to drive silver out of existence as a money metal and to retain gold as the sole basis and unit of value, where is this new money to come from?

The statement of the Director of the Mint shows that in 1894 the entire production of gold in the world amounted to only $180,000,000, and that $33,515,000 of this gold was used in the arts, leaving only $147,000,000 for coinage purposes and to increase the money of the world. As I have already shown, if these clearing-house figures are correct, in order to serve as a basis for this increased business we must have over $100,000,000 of new money in this country alone; but there is only, as shown by the figures, $147,000,000 of gold produced in the entire world that is available for coinage purposes.

Now, if we consume $100,000,000 of that $147,000,000 of gold, where is the balance of the world to get its gold or its coin with which to transact its business; and it must be remembered that our share of this gold would be less than $5,000,000 if all get their share. I know it will be answered that we shall have bank notes, we shall have paper money redeemable in coin. But, Mr. Speaker, when you have paper money redeemable in coin you require more than 5 per cent as a basis of circulation. I understand the best authorities state that there should always be one-third of coin on which to base your paper circulation; it is not contended by anyone that banking business can be done on a safe basis unless you have one dollar of coin for every three dollars of paper. Thus it is shown that your pyramid of confidence transactions, of confidence money, will become top-heavy and must fall, unless the base of coin money is sufficiently broad to support it.

But, you say, "We are willing to coin silver as fast as we can"; but how? You want to coin silver and support it by reason of the fact that it is redeemable in a gold dollar. Mr. Speaker, I assert that if that is the basis on which you want to coin silver, then so far as the people of this country are concerned, so far as the civilization is concerned, you might as well wipe out silver entirely and simply issue paper notes; because when you support silver on that basis you are not given it its true function as a money metal; you are only supporting it by the fact that it has the credit of the Government to sustain it. You are not making the base of your currency system any more stable than it was before.

[Mr. COX addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. BRUMM addressed the House. See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. LACEY (at 11 o'clock and 58 minutes a. m., Wednesday, February 12, 1896), the House adjourned unti 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 12, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN ALASKA AND BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred Senate joint resolution (No. 39) making an appropriation of $75,000 to defray the expenses of locating the boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and British North American territory, having considered the same, to report it back and recommend its passage without amendment.

I merely desire to say that, after a full consideration, the committee was unanimous in recommending the appropriation. I wish to yield a short time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY], who is a member of the committee, touching this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 39) making an appropriation to defray the joint expense of locating the boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and the British North American territory.

Resolved, etc., That in view of the expediency of forthwith negotiating a convention with Great Britain for marking convenient points upon the one hundred and forty-first meridian of west longitude, where it forms, under existing treaty provisions, the boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and the British North American territory, and to enable the President to execute the provisions of such convention without delay when concluded, the sum of $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, under the direction of the President, to defray the share of the United States in the joint expense of locating said meridian and marking said boundary by an international commission.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the committee, I desire to say only a few words in explanation of the purpose of this joint resolution, because there has been and is a good deal of confusion in the public mind, and possibly in the minds of some members of this House, as to what is the exact status of the controversy, in so far as it has become a controversy, touching the boundary line which divides the Territory of Alaska from British North America. By a treaty concluded between this country and Russia in the year 1867 all the Russian North American possessions were ceded to the United States, and the eastern boundary line of those possessions (now called Alaska) was declared to be the same boundary laid down in the convention or treaty concluded between Great Britain and Russia in the year 1825. That boundary line has two parts, and each of these parts has given rise to something of controversy; but these controversies have not yet reached an unfriendly stage.

By the treaties just mentioned, the eastern limit of Alaska is described as "Commencing from the southernmost point of the island called Prince of Wales Island," in latitude 54° 40′ north, and ascending to the north along the channel called Portland Channel as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude, and from this point following "the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast as far as the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude," and from that point of intersection following the one hundred and forty-first meridian to the Frozen Ocean.

But it was further provided—

That whenever the summit of the mountains which extend in a direction parallel to the coast from the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude shall prove to be at the distance of more than 10 marine leagues from the ocean, the limit * * * shall be found by a line parallel to the winding of the coast, and which shall never exceed the distance of 10 marine leagues therefrom.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been found that in fact the topography of the country, from the commencement of this eastern boundary line to the point where it meets the one hundred and forty-first meridian, is different from what it was supposed to be at the time of the making of the Russo-British treaty of 1825, and therefore disputes have recently arisen as to the true location of that part of the boundary. In 1884 the Canadian authorities, abandoning the location shown by all published maps for many years, claimed for the first time in an official map that the line at its commencement, instead of ascending the Portland Canal, should ascend an estuary lying some distance farther west and called Behm Canal. This claim places in dispute a territory which has always been considered a part of the Territory of Alaska, and which equals in area the State of Connecticut.

Still later, in the year 1887, a claim has been made by the Canadian map makers that the remainder of this portion of the boundary ought to be pushed nearer to the ocean than previous maps showed it to be. This claim arises from the fact that whereas the treaty called for the "summit of the mountains" to be followed from the latitude of 56° in a northwesterly direction, subsequent surveys have demonstrated the fact that there is no range of mountains which will answer the description in that clause of the treaty. But, according to our contention, this makes it necessary to fall back upon the second branch of the description, which declares in effect that in case there shall be no range of mountains within the limit of 10 marine leagues from the coast, extending in a northerly direction from the latitude of 56°, the line shall follow the windings of the coast and be nowhere more than 10 marine leagues distant therefrom. That, in short, is one branch of the controversy.

In 1892 a convention or agreement was concluded between the Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain, which had for its object a joint or coincident topographical survey of the southeasterly territory of Alaska, from the latitude of 54° 40′ to the point where the one hundred and forty-first meridian is encountered, in order to ascertain the facts and data necessary to enable us to determine where, according to the spirit and intent of the treaty, the boundary line should be located. That joint survey has been completed and a report was signed by the commissioners on the 31st day of last December, but the maps have not yet been engraved and the matter is not in a condition to be laid before Congress. I may say, however, that we are assured by the officials representing the Coast and Geodetic Survey that their surveys have demonstrated the fact that there is no range of mountains such as at the time the treaty was concluded between Russia and Great Britain was assumed to exist, and no range of mountains to which the language of the Russian treaty of 1867 can apply. Therefore the claim on behalf of the Government of the United States is and must be that the Territory of Alaska, that is, the southeasterly portion of it, shall be bounded to the eastward by a line distant 10 marine leagues from the coast and following the windings of that coast.

Mr. KNOX. Does the gentleman mean the coast of the mainland or the coast of the islands?

Mr. PITNEY. I was coming to that, Mr. Speaker. On the Canadian side of the question two claims are made. In the first place, they claim that while there is no range of mountains distant 10 marine leagues from the coast or thereabouts, there is a range of mountains very near to the coast of the mainland, and that the line should be run there near the coast, which would leave in British territory a large part of Taku Inlet and a large part of Lynn Canal, two great estuaries which extend into the interior. This would bring the British possessions down very close to the ocean, and at the same time the American Territory of Alaska would be dismembered, and it would be impossible for us to proceed by land from one part of that Territory to the other without the consent of the British authorities. Moreover, the British Government could establish fortifications upon tide water, could run a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Taku Inlet or to Lynn Canal, and could thus control those two great entrances into the interior of the country. The second claim on the part of the Canadians is that the 10 marine leagues, or 30 nautical miles, equivalent to about 35 statute miles, which are to be the limit of the width of this portion of our possessions, should be measured not from the coast of the main continent, but from the outermost edge of the archipelago which fringes the continent. The result of allowing that claim would be to throw the control of all these waterways into British hands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to discuss the matter further to show to the House how great is the importance of this dispute. As yet the matter is in a friendly position between our Government and the authorities of Great Britain, and it is desirable that it should be left in a position of amicable adjustment between the parties.

The second great question between the British authorities on the one side and the Government and people of the United States on the other relates to the true location upon the surface of the earth of the one hundred and forty-first meridian of west longitude, and it is to this branch of the subject that this present resolution mainly relates. In regard to that meridian no doubt arises from the language of the treaty. The doubt arises only in attempting to mark upon the earth's surface the location of the meridian. That location is to be ascertained by astronomical survey; not by the ordinary topographical survey, but by observation of the stars, and it is a very expensive operation and requires a great deal of time.

Now, money has already been spent under the authority of the United States Government, and some also by the Canadian or British authorities, for the purpose of ascertaining with such degree of certainty as human observation permits where the one hundred and forty-first meridian runs. At some points along the line both the Canadian surveyors and our own have made observations. At one point—at the crossing of Forty Mile Creek—the two surveys are only about 6 feet apart; in another place—at the Yukon River—they are 618 feet apart. The meridian has been located with this approximate degree of accuracy upon the principal water courses which form the highways by means of which miners and other immigrants enter the country.

It is very desirable, in the opinion of the Department of State; in the opinion of the Senate, who have passed this joint resolution, and in the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, who have reported it to the House, that this survey should be promptly completed by duly authorized commissioners on the part of the Dominion of Canada and duly authorized commissioners on the part of the Government of the United States; that an agreement should be reached and monuments should be set up at all the principal points along the one hundred and forty-first meridian, in order that settlers and others shall be able to tell whether any particular spot is in the British possessions or is United States territory. So soon as the principal points may have been ascertained by astronomical survey and monuments erected upon the ground, those points may be connected by lines run by the ordinary methods of triangulation.

This appropriation is called for in order to enable the engineers on the part of the United States to join with those on the part of Canada in completing this survey. The proposition was made to our Department of State last summer on the part of the Dominion of Canada that we should either join in the expense of a joint survey or that we should adopt provisionally the results of a survey which had been partially completed by Mr. William Ogilvie in behalf of Canada, and in the event that we did provisionally adopt his survey we should pay one-half of the expense incurred. It was thought best that we should enter at once into a convention or agreement in order to have a definite survey made and agreed to by both parties and to have the location of the one hundred and forty-first meridian marked by visible monuments. This is desirable not only with reference to the disputed territory on that meridian, but in order to lead to an amicable arrangement, which, it is hoped, may soon be entered into with regard to the disputed territory along the southeastern part of the boundary.

Mr. LOUD. I desire to ask the gentleman what powers are now vested by law in this commission?

Mr. PITNEY. None, as yet; no agreement has yet been made; no commission has yet been appointed.

Mr. LOUD. Would not the passage of this resolution empower that engineering commission to locate the line, and would it not thus become fixed?

Mr. PITNEY. That is the object of the appropriation. The passage of this resolution, however, does not conclude the Government of the United States in this matter. It simply enables the President to enter into a convention with Great Britain, subject to the approval of the Senate, and then to appoint commissioners to represent us in such a joint survey.

Mr. LOUD. Then this does not take the matter ultimately out of the hands of Congress?

Mr. PITNEY. No; not at all.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise only for the purpose of correcting a rumor that has gone out into the country and which I have seen printed in some of the newspapers—that the United States Government, or rather the Coast and Geodetic Survey, has adopted the survey made by the Canadian authorities in regard to the line running southeast of Mount St. Elias. That is not true. There have been parties at work in making that survey—the Canadian party and the American party. These two parties have been broken up into smaller parties. With each Canadian party there has always been a representative of the American Government, and with each American party always a representative of the Canadian Government; and the information we have is that the American parties have made about two-thirds of the survey, and the most important part of it.

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman permit a statement? With regard to the topographical survey from the vicinity of Mount St. Elias to the vicinity of the Portland Canal the method adopted has been this: There have been about a dozen American parties in the field, and with each of them there has been a Canadian representative, and there have been ten or a dozen Canadian parties in the field, with each of which there has been an American representative.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. Each one of those parties has covered a certain section of territory. The American surveys have in that way covered the whole of the territory from the coast line to and beyond the 10-marine-league limit, and the Canadian surveys have covered the greater part of the same territory, each party having with it, as I have already said, a representative of the other Government.

Mr. SAYERS. The American parties have accomplished about two-thirds of the entire topographical survey.

Mr. KNOX. Will the gentleman [Mr. PITNEY] who last occupied the floor yield for a question?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does this resolution provide for a resurvey of the line in southeastern Alaska?

Mr. PITNEY. No. The survey of the country in southeastern Alaska—the topographical survey—has been completed, but the maps have not been engraved, so that they are not available at this time.

Mr. KNOX. If that is the true line, whether it be the line of the coast or the continent, or the westerly line of the island, would there be any need of a resurvey?

Mr. PITNEY. As I understand your question, no.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and, being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1717) to grant to the city of Charleston, S. C., the use of certain real estate in said city on which is situated the building known as The Exchange; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CHRISTIANS IN ARMENIA.

Mr. SORG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time to consider, or to have read and printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a joint resolution passed by the general assembly of the State of Ohio petitioning Congress for the protection of the Christians in Armenia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the execution of the agreement of the House with reference to debate upon the Senate amendment of the bill H. R. 2904.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment to have re-referred a bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2904.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

BOND REDEMPTION FUND.

[Mr. DOLLIVER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. McMILLIN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, my attention was attracted awhile ago by a remark of my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] that there were many things relating to the money question which we did not know. Yet one of the conspicuous, and I may say interesting, features of this protracted discussion of the money question has been the sublime certitude at which all the speakers seem to have arrived in relation to all these complex and intricate problems. I was reminded of a colloquy between two characters in that inimitable play of Shakespeare, Henry VI, a colloquy between Plantagenet and Somerset. The former said that the truth on his side was so naked that any purblind eye could find it out. Somerset replied, "And on my side the truth is so clear, so shining, and so evident that it would glimmer through a blind man's eye."

It is not so with me. I am not vain enough to indulge the expectation that I can make my opinions so commanding, strong, and convincing as to overthrow the supremacy of prejudice or break the tyranny of preconceived opinion over any mind, or even to answer to the satisfaction of all the arguments advanced in support of the views tenaciously and honestly held by others. "Let him who thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" is scripture which seems to be addressed to those who think they have mastered the money question. I quite agree with an observation of Professor Perry, that the power to regulate our money could not be lodged in more dangerous hands than those of him who thinks he is competent to exercise it. The remark of Senator Dumas in the French Senate is equally pregnant with salutary caution.

Those—

Said he—who approach this question for the first time decide it at once. Those who study it with care, hesitate. Those who are obliged practically to decide, doubt and stop, overwhelmed with the weight of the enormous responsibility.

So if I were required to decide all the disputed points in the age-long controversy on silver, I would exclaim with the sage: "Give me infinite wisdom or relieve me from the impossible task."

GOOD MONEY.

There is, however, no obscurity or intricacy about the proposition that the people of the United States desire good money—I may say the best money anywhere in use. This statement will probably meet with universal acceptance.

One of the requisites of good money is that its intrinsic or commercial value is equivalent to its coinage value, and is equal in purchasing power to that used by the leading commercial nations with which we deal, or is convertible at the pleasure of the holder into such money. For example, every dollar coined out of the standard money metal, gold, is good money. It neither lies nor cheats. It does not even prevaricate or suppress. It is honest and outspoken. Its value is equivalent to the debt it is commanded to pay. It stands the test of fire and hammer. It preserves its identity in the crucible and in the countingroom.

The subsidiary silver coins are also good money, though not possessing an intrinsic value equal to their coinage value, because they are redeemable in full-value money. The silver dollar is within our definition of good money as long as it is convertible into gold at the pleasure of the holder. There is no statute authorizing its redemption in any kind of money, but the faith of the Government is pledged to maintain it at a parity with and to keep it interchangeable with gold. In other words, it carries the Government's indorsement. If I take my note for a thousand dollars to a bank they will not discount it, but if I take it back with the indorsement of a responsible person on it, they give me the money at once. The silver dollar is worth 50 cents in its own right. The indorsement of the United States makes it equivalent to gold. But while the indorsement of a responsible person makes my note good in the banks, if it was known that said person was indorsing miscellaneously, even indorsing notes in blank for me to fill up at my pleasure, his credit would be gone and his indorsement would no longer make my note good. Similarly with the silver dollar; the Government must not indorse too many of them or somebody will suspect its credit. As long, however, as the number carried does not exceed the power of the Government to keep faith with the people, the silver dollars are good money.

All the paper money now in use is good money, because it is all redeemable in good money. It will remain good money so long and only so long as the volume of it is limited to the capacity of the Government to keep its pledge of redemption. One other qualification is pertinent in this connection, though no part of the definition of good money; that is, that it must be stable and not fluctuating in value. Its power in exchange should be the same as near as may be when the debt is paid as when contracted. Money too much contracted in volume is too dear; too much inflated is too cheap. An unlimited money is worthless money. Unduly inflated money cheats the creditor; when unduly contracted it cheats the debtor. It serves equitably all classes at all times when it is stable in volume and purchasing power.

These observations do not exclude the idea that money that does not square with the requirements of safety and soundness I have set forth may be useful and convenient in facilitating exchanges. Poor agencies are many times useful, but good ones are always better. Our continental currency was useful. The assignats of France were serviceable. Inconvertible paper money has in our more recent experience been useful and necessary, but it was not good money.

FREE COINAGE.

To keep our silver money good in the sense I have indicated, that is, to keep the silver dollar equivalent in purchasing power with that used by the commercial countries with which we deal, is not possible under free silver coinage at 16 to 1 by the United States alone.

This brings me face to face with the measure sent to this House by the Senate providing for the free coinage of silver, and which is now before us, and on which I crave the indulgence of the House while I express the conclusions at which I have arrived, and the reasons therefor, as briefly as I can.

The United States and the world need both the money metals. Neither can be dispensed with for monetary uses without causing the gravest consequences to the human race. To argue which could be more easily dispensed with would be a supreme folly, scarcely exceeded by that of the fond father who, desiring to know which of his three sons loved him most, sent them to a far country and anxiously waited to see which of them would show the greatest filial affection by bringing to his father the costliest present. One of them obtained a fairy's carpet that would carry you anywhere you wished to go over land or sea, another secured a magic medicine that would cure all diseases flesh is heir to, and the third, not to be outdone, purchased at great price a mirror in which you could see any person or place you wished. The dutiful sons, before embarking for home, compared their gifts. They looked into the mirror and saw their father sick nigh unto death at his home. On the fairy's carpet they were transported to the bedside of the dying parent, and with the magic medicine they restored him to health and to good sense as well, for he never again attempted to compare the degrees of affection felt for him by his children. He was satisfied by his stratagem that they bore him an equal love.

I am a bimetallist, and therefore I am opposed to the free coinage of silver by the United States alone at 16 to 1. My honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] who has just taken his seat says he, too, is a bimetallist, yet we are as far apart as the poles. In this connection I would like to say that I do not attach as much importance to statistics on the money question as my honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] seems to. I am much of the opinion of a writer whom I read not long since on the subject of statistics, who said, "There are three kinds of liars in the world. The first is a liar, the second is a damned liar, and the third is statistics." I do not believe that the figures with which we have been regaled in this protracted discussion throw much valuable light upon the inquiry. If I were a silver monometallist I would favor the Senate proposition, for it would place us on a silver basis as speedily as effects of that kind can follow their causes.

At this point, if I have the attention of my distinguished friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and two or three others whom I know do not believe a word I say on this subject, I would be willing to dispense with the attention of all the remainder of the House, for these honorable gentlemen are the chief sinners in this matter, for they sin against light; and, as a preacher once said, "I am here just now to call sinners and not the righteous to repentance." My first proposition is that if the mints of the United States were open to silver at 16 to 1 the price of silver would be $1.29 per ounce, either in gold or silver. If in gold, all the surplus silver bullion of the world would come here for coinage, for it is self-evident that if 371¼ grains of fine silver could be purchased in any market or taken out of any mine for fifty and converted into a hundred cents by coinage every holder of silver bullion everywhere in the world would avail himself of that opportunity and ship his silver for coinage and take away gold or its equivalent dollar for dollar. The other alternative is the silver basis. That is, the price of silver would be $1.29 per ounce in silver and not in gold; in other words, the silver in a dollar now worth 50 cents in gold would be worth a hundred cents in silver. No one would sell for less, for he could have it coined for that. These alternative situations are illustrated in the United States and Mexico. In the former the silver dollar is on a gold basis, in the latter it is on a silver basis, the result being that our silver dollar, containing 412½ grains of standard silver, will exchange in Mexico for two Mexican dollars containing each 420 grains of standard silver.

It is thus seen that to express the status of silver in terms of dollars is one, and in terms of purchasing power quite another and different thing. In the United States the silver dollar is the equivalent of gold in purchasing power. It is held to that equivalence by the power of a people's faith in a nation's pledges. But on a silver basis its purchasing power would be measured by its bullion value in the world's market, as in Mexico. Now it walks, in part at least, by faith; then it would walk wholly by sight. Left to itself, it would be just what it is; what the world makes it. It falls to its own level as soon as it is detached from the supports of public faith, which hold it at the higher gold level. It would then be the money of account as it is in Mexico, as paper was here during the war, and is now in the Argentine Republic, though only worth 27 cents on the dollar in gold. All computations and calculations of value would be in dollars, but silver dollars, not gold ones. Gold would at once be at a premium because of silver being overvalued, and would gradually go out of circulation, to the serious contraction of our money volume. The deficiency could not be supplied with silver money for lack of coinage facilities, for the utmost capacity of our mints does not exceed $40,000,000 per year. In this event it is some solace to know that there would be no profit in sending foreign silver here for coinage, and none would come except in the usual course of commerce.

This is as clear a statement as I can make without greater elaboration of the event which is certain to supervene on the adoption of free silver coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States alone. The necessity for the argument has, I think, been superseded by the course of events and the notable concurrence of opinion on the subject among leading bimetallists in Europe and America. William P. St. John, president of the Mercantile National Bank of New York, the great silver champion of the East, said in his examination before the Banking and Currency Committee of the last Congress:

The free coinage of silver would place this country on a silver basis immediately.

Hon. A. J. Warner, of Ohio, the president of the Bimetallic League of the United States, said:

The free coinage of silver will ultimately put us on a silver basis.

But the conclusion at which we have arrived by our own reasoning is not only confirmed by the great preponderance of opinion among men of light and leading, but also by the experience of mankind as well. Secretary Carlisle, in his Memphis speech, said there was not a free-silver country in the world that was not on a silver basis. Indeed, more satisfactory arguments against the free coinage of silver by the United States alone could hardly be desired than the five propositions of the Secretary, which I believe have never been disputed, and which I reproduce as a suitable conclusion to this part of my argument. These are his propositions:

First. There is not a free-coinage country in the world to-day that is not on a silver basis.
Second. There is not a gold-standard country in the world to-day that does not use silver as money along with gold.
Third. There is not a silver-standard country in the world to-day that uses any gold as money along with silver.
Fourth. There is not a silver-standard country in the world that has more than one-third as much money in circulation per capita as the United States have; and Fifth. There is not a silver-standard country in the world to-day where the laboring man receives as fair pay for his work.

CONSEQUENCES OF A SILVER BASIS.

Then if the silver basis is certain to ensue in the event of free coinage by this country alone, it is important to apprehend what that means to the United States. The considerations involved are numerous and their bearings, in some instances, not a little obscure, but some of the consequences are easily brought into distinct view and are calculated to excite apprehension in every discreet and well-ordered mind. The disadvantages we would suffer in our foreign commerce are the same as all countries in a like situation have experienced in the past, notably Mexico, India, our own country during the war period, and the Argentine Republic, at this time under a paper régime.

The instability of exchange would reduce our commercial intercourse with foreign countries to a colossal system of gambling. No American importer would know what to pay for a bill of goods bought on a credit of six months, or at what price to sell them on a corresponding credit, because of the fluctuations in the value of the money of account. Mexican importers have to pay near $2,000 of their money for an invoice of goods worth $1,000 in New York or London. The fall in silver liable to take place at any time may cause a rise in exchange which would entail serious losses upon the importer. The only escape he has is to run up the price on his customers to cover his risks.

Why, I heard the other day of a French company who had undertaken to construct a mechanical plant in Mexico for a large sum of money. They did not stipulate the kind of money in which the contract was to be paid, but when they came to talk about that the French company asked the Mexicans, "In what kind of money are we to be paid for this work?" And the Mexicans answered, "In silver money, for that is the kind of money we use in this country"; but the Frenchman said, "No, I can not agree to do this work and be paid in silver, for I can not tell what the contract would be worth when the debt matures, because I do not have any means of knowing how much gold could be bought by the silver named in the contract." And the Mexicans said, "We can not agree to pay you in gold, because we would have no means of telling how much silver it would take to buy the necessary amount of gold by the time the contract matured." So, as a matter of fact, they mutually agreed to declare the contract off, because the two countries that were trying to agree upon the terms of a contract were on different monetary bases.

Without enlarging too much the effects to be expected in the United States may be thus summarized: First, an increase in the price of all imported goods sold in our markets; second, a loss to the National Treasury in the funds sent abroad to pay interest and our foreign obligations; third, a loss to all American corporations whose bonds are held in Europe in increased interest rates; fourth, a loss to all American citizens temporarily sojourning abroad and receiving money from home for their support, this loss being equivalent to the depreciation of silver; fifth, a loss to every laboring man in the United States by diminishing the purchasing of a day's labor.

These afflictions are suffered by all countries whose money of account is depreciated below the level of the money of the commercial world. In the recent American monetary conference distinct expression was given by the delegates from the South American States of the serious difficulties, experienced, and the grave consequences suffered by the silver-using countries in their commerce with the United States on account of the great fluctuation in the value of the white metal.

The delegate from Bolivia regretted that there could be so little commerce between his country and the United States, in part because of the enormous discount on Bolivian money in this country. They paid, he said, for the petroleum, cotton stuffs, hardware, agricultural implements, and machinery imported from this country by drafts on London, the cost of which was so great that their Bolivian money was reduced to nearly one-half its value.

In India the disturbances due to the same cause are graphically described by her delegates in the International Monetary Conference of 1892. One of them, Mr. Strachey, said:

India has been the victim of the downward fluctuations in the exchange value of the rupee, caused by the alteration in the intrinsic value of silver in relation to gold. The situation of affairs is so strained that a serious agitation has arisen and pressure has been put on the Government to apply a remedy for the numerous difficulties which are regarded as being due to the fall in the value of the rupee, affecting not only the public finances and administration, but with equal severity numerous commercial, industrial, and social interests.

And the remedy agitated was the gold standard, provided international bimetallism was not attainable. Another delegate from India, Sir Guilford L. Molesworth, referred to these distresses as "the numerous and constantly recurring evils to which India is subjected, evils that are not merely financial, but political, seriously menacing her most vital interests." And yet India is better situated in respect to these disadvantages than any other silver country, for she has no trade balances to pay to other countries. The great strain upon her is the payment of her indebtedness to England, which must be paid in gold or its equivalent, and as the amount is a stipulated sum of many million rupees, collected from her people in taxes, the lower the price of silver the greater number of rupees are necessary to make the required amount in gold.

Our situation as a debtor nation would be similar to that of India in this respect. The large sums we have to pay abroad as interest on gold obligations, which amount to more than $100,000,000 annually, would be almost doubled with silver at its present price and we on a silver basis. Then these obligations when they mature must be paid in gold or its equivalent, and here again we would be subjected to a double burden, under which even so strong a country as ours might bend.

These are some of the consequences connected with our foreign commercial relations that would ensue upon the adoption of the free-silver policy unassisted by other countries. But the financial dislocation, I might almost say the monetary cataclysm, with the immeasurable confusion and injustice which that implies, it would cause in our domestic finances and industry beggars description and appalls the mind. The dramatic situation would occur of course immediately upon the passage of such a law. After the first effect was exhausted the evil would continue in a modified form and would operate with tempered severity, with some regularity and with a measure of mercy to vested interests. But from the shock of such a convulsion and the devastation of the upheaval who would be spared? If there is a man who stands in the naked attitude of a debtor who owes somebody and whom nobody owes, he would find an advantage in the calamities that would fall upon his neighbors and friends. If he had borrowed $1,000 worth of purchasing power or had purchased $1,000 worth of property at its gold value, he could pay the bill in silver with $500 worth of purchasing power. Whether he would avail himself of such a benefit at the expense of his creditors without reluctance or compunctions would depend on how he was brought up.

But the creditors, who are they? And here is the pathos if not the tragedy of the situation. Somebody on the other side—I do not recall who it was, but I strongly suspect it was my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]——

Mr. BRUMM. Possibly; but I object to your saying that he is "on the other side." He is on the right side—between the two wrong sides. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. I very gladly retract the offensive remark. I made it unwittingly. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Very well.

Mr. BROSIUS. My colleague said, and he said it very eloquently and with a great deal of force, as though it were the vital point in his discussion of the subject, that for every creditor there must be a debtor. He never was more mistaken in his life than he was in the idea which he sought to convey, though as a verbal proposition of course it was a truism. In fact, however, there are ten creditors, aye, more than ten, for every debtor in the United States. Who are the creditors? They are the owners of every fixed charge, every debt, every annuity, every pension, every bond of the Government, and of every corporation and every share of stocks in banks and stock companies, and every deposit in all the savings and other banks in the United States. And who are the owners of these credits? Among them are found crippled and aged soldiers of the Republic, their widows and orphans; widows who live on dowers in their husbands' estates, and millions of meritorious citizens whose earnings are deposited and whose subsistence comes from fixed incomes, every dollar of which would lose a part of its purchasing power the moment our money of account changed from gold to silver.

In the savings banks of the United States are earnings of the poor in small deposits aggregating near $2,000,000,000. Every toiler who is a depositor is a creditor. The sum of these accumulated interests that would be affected by free coinage must be enormous. Some have estimated it at $25,000,000,000. But in the enumeration we must not omit the decreased wages of labor, which seems to be a concomitant of depreciated money everywhere. It is reckoned among the advantages of India and Mexico over other countries that wages are extremely low. Sir Mersey Henry Thompson, of England, the author of a prize essay on India's advantages over England, said:

Wages in gold-using countries are 100 per cent higher than in silver-using countries, and the manufacturer of India can obtain his labor at half the cost paid in England.

The same view was expressed by Señor Romero, the Mexican minister at Washington. He said:

The depreciation of silver has favored the Mexican capitalists by lowering the wages of their employees.

I need hardly say that any public policy which has for its recommendation the lowering of the wages of labor can not be honored with general acceptance in the United States. How much this immeasurable combination of interests would lose in purchasing power, let those calculate who will. I care not to dip my pen in the ruddy drops wrung from the crushed lives of the poor to figure up the sum that shall measure their distress and degradation.

It is so apropos to this part of the discussion, and affords so graphic an illustration of the effect upon the labor of the country which would ensue upon the adoption of free-silver coinage as a national policy, that I reproduce the statement of a distinguished Senator, as follows:

A day's wages at $1.60 in gold in 1891 would buy 10 pounds of coffee, instead of 3½ pounds in 1866; 6½ pounds of butter, instead of 3; 24 pounds of meat, instead of 10; 5 gallons of New Orleans molasses, instead of 1½; 26 pounds of rice, instead of 11; 26 pounds of soap, instead of 8; 50 pounds of refined sugar, instead of 15; 26 pounds of calico, instead of 5½; 3 pounds of two-ply ingrain carpet, instead of 1; 15 yards of denims, instead of 3; 26 yards of drilling, instead of 5; 23 yards of gingham, instead of 9; 24 yards of sheeting, instead of 6½; seven yards of women's all-wool dress goods, instead of 2½; 40 table plates, instead of 17; 46 pairs of teacups and saucers, instead of 22, and 6½ dozen glass goblets, instead of half a dozen.

It has been said that gold is the rich man's money. These figures prove that it is the poor man's money, and the money of everyone who works for wages. The wage worker is always cheated by any depreciated money, more by depreciated paper money, because it has no intrinsic value to check its expansion.

The wage worker always gets the most for his services when the dollar in which he is paid is the dollar of the commerical world. The whole people, except speculators and commercial gamblers, are injuriously affected by depreciated money of any kind, but the injury is felt with crushing effect by the man or woman whose life depends upon constant employment and daily earnings.

The census of 1890 shows that there were in the United States at that time 22,733,661 laborers, male and female, in all occupations. Of that number, 15,099,901 were wage earners who were paid in money for their services; 4,942,418 were hired laborers in manufactures; 3,004,015 were hired farm laborers; 1,443,399 were hired domestic servants; 639,413 were conductors, engineers, firemen, and other employees of railroad companies; 611,417 were carpenters and joiners; 556,900 were clerks; 341,811 were school-teachers; 368,502 were draymen and hackmen; 264,000 were salesmen; 248,443 were launderers and laundresses; 219,868 were painters; 205,315 were blacksmiths; 185,197 were tailors; 159,374 were bookkeepers and accountants; 133,518 were sawmill operators; 104,803 were physicians; 88,295 were clergymen; 84,976 were barbers and hairdressers; 86,454 were printers and pressmen; 74,633 were watchmen and policemen; 58,701 were commercial travelers; 63,348 were telegraph and telephone operators and linemen; 44,349 were boarding-house keepers; 44,110 were hotel keepers; 54,029 were hostlers; 72,601 were laborers employed in vineyards and nurseries; 70,734 were laborers employed by stockmen; 43,242 were civil engineers; 33,697 were wood choppers; 33,333 were stenographers and typewriters; 26,767 were livery-stable keepers; 17,498 were dentists. These are a part, and only a part, of the vast army of wage workers who are to be injured, and seriously injured, by the expulsion of the present standard and the adoption of any depreciated standard of value.

DEMONETIZATION.

It may not be unsuitable in this connection to try to disillusion the minds of some good people who believe that the act of 1873, the so-called demonetization act, in connection with similar acts of legislation in European countries, has halved the metallic basis of the world's money. This error has been ingeniously disseminated by a recent budget of half truths and whole errors called Coin's Financial School. A story is told by Senator PALMER of Illinois, illustrating the mischief this little book is doing. The Senator said he had received a letter from an old soldier friend who had served in his regiment, saying:

DEAR GENERAL: Two new books have come into my neighborhood lately, and they are playing hell with the Democratic party. One is named Coin, and the boys all read it; another is called Trilby, and the girls all read it.

Many fierce and savage epithets have been bestowed upon that act of 1873 by speakers and writers whose zeal is swifter of foot than their judgment. It is not style, however, in economic discussion that we are concerned with. It is a man's doctrine rather than his demeanor that interests us. There is no danger of discreet people mistaking vituperation for veracity, or imaginative fervor for economic fact. No one disputes the existence of economic disturbances or the serious consequences resulting from them in the last twenty years. Nor is it our purpose to inquire whether the act of 1873 was a trick or an open and honest performance of legislative duty, for its consequences, whatever they were, are the matter in hand, not the motive of the act. A surgeon diagnosing a gunshot wound does not need to know whether it was inflicted by accident or design.

All I propose doing is to look through the obscuring mass of vituperative verbiage with which enthusiasts have covered the subject and in the interest of historic truth find out what dimensions the demonetization of silver has in reality in the United States. There are people who make shadows on the wall with their own hands and then take fright at the horrid pictures. Wisdom admonishes us against a folly of that kind. I want to vindicate the United States against the aspersions cast upon her, that she is responsible by reason of her legislation for the demonetization of silver, the fall in prices, and the general monetary dislocation of the time. With a knowledge of the facts you can not fail to believe with me that our country is free from delinquency on this score and has fairly earned all the credit the world gives her for her heroic efforts to sustain silver as a money metal.

What actually occurred in 1873 was to drop the silver dollar from our coinage. That act was as harmless at that time as an act would have been forbidding the coinage of aluminum, for there were no silver dollars to speak of in circulation, and scarcely any had been coined for a quarter of a century, for the very sufficient reason that silver was worth more in bullion than in coined dollars and could not be coined without a loss. It is difficult to see how a circulation could be impaired by excluding from it a coin that had not been in for many years. Prof. Simon Newcomb wrote in 1879:

It is probably safe to assert that one-half of the citizens of our country born since 1840 have never seen a silver dollar. But if it had been a current coin in 1873, as the gold dollar was in 1891, to drop it from the coinage was in no real sense a demonetization of silver more than was the dropping of the gold dollar in 1891 a demonetization of gold, looking at these two similar acts of legislation dropping two coins from our system, one because it was too small and the other because it was too large. Apart from all else it does not appear to one of medium faculty that one was in any real sense more effective than the other in causing the demonetization of the respective metals.

But for the act of 1853, which effected demonetization to a much larger extent than that of 1873, there would have been a very small fraction of our silver money in any way disturbed. From 1853 to 1873 we purchased and coined $62,723,695 of demonetized silver; that is, silver money not of ultimate redemption.

The following is a statement of the several denominations of silver coined in that period:

Silver dollars coined from 1792 to 1853	$2,505,886
Half dollars coined from 1792 to 1853	66,321,636
Quarter dollars coined from 1792 to 1853	3,964,125
Dimes coined from 1792 to 1853	3,902,213
Half dimes coined from 1792 to 1853	1,824,623

All of this silver, except the dollars, was demonetized in 1853; that is, $76,012,597 was demonetized, leaving only $2,505,886 retaining the full legal-tender quality, which all the silver possessed prior to 1853.

In the same time we coined under free coinage 5,524,350 silver dollars, and during the same period we coined $611,810,808 of gold. To say that the two metals entered the mints during those twenty years arm in arm suggests the picture of an infant arm in arm with a California giant.

But this is not the full strength of the argument; that requires a view of the total coinage of denominations under a dollar from 1792 to 1873, and here it is:

Total silver coinage under the dollar from 1792 to 1893.

Half dollars	$128,391,220
Quarters	45,949,731
Twenty-cent pieces	271,000
Dimes	28,405,071
Half dimes	4,880,219

This entire sum was demonetized by the act of 1853 and made token money, while the total amount of dollars coined from 1792 to 1873 which it is claimed was demonetized by the act of 1873 was a little over $8,000,000.

After the alleged act of demonetizing we began the policy of monetizing silver, and continued doing so from 1878 to 1893 at a more rapid rate than was ever known before in the history of the world. We purchased for monetary uses about 500,000,000 ounces (496,984,889) of fine silver at a cost of over $500,000,000 ($508,933,975), and coined about 420,000,000 silver legal-tender dollars—more than fifty times as many silver dollars coined in fifteen years after demonetization as in the eighty prior years. Is it not, therefore, as clear as demonstration itself that no other nation ever made such heroic exertions to uphold any form of money as the United States made for twenty years to maintain the honor and value of silver? Not only our own but the lips of other countries have generously praised our long-continued and persevering struggle to hold up the arms of the white metal. Mr. Montefiore Levi, the distinguished Belgian financier, who presided over the Brussels Monetary Conference, alluded in the kindest terms to the efforts we had made to avert the fall of silver. Bertram Currie, one of the delegates to the Brussels conference from Great Britain, said:

We have witnessed the heroic labors of the United States to sustain silver.

Sir Rivers Wilson, another delegate from Great Britain, said:

It is doubtful whether the United States can possibly continue indefinitely the gigantic efforts which it has made without effect for so many years to maintain and to raise the price of silver.

Dr. E. B. Andrews, one of our own delegates, in reply to an intimation that the United States was to blame for the monetary situation, aptly said:

To make such a charge is like indicting for murder a man who has bravely tried to save his fellow bent upon committing suicide. But we can not carry this fraternal effort much further. We shall not forever pursue alone the task of sustaining the price of silver.

Mr. Boissevain, a delegate from the Netherlands, said:

It seems to me unjust and contrary to historical facts to lay the burden of responsibility for the present situation upon the United States.

Senator JONES, another of our delegates, said to the conference:

The fact is, the price of silver has been maintained by the aid of the United States. It has the same value to-day it had when it had unrestricted access to the mints. Its purchasing power, its control over commodities, has not declined.

These are testimonies which effectually repel the imputation that the United States has been delinquent in not making proper exertions to uphold the price of silver, and they are all borne out by the figures I have already produced showing the enormous increase in the use of silver in the United States since the passage of the act of 1873.

Corresponding figures for the commercial countries of Europe furnish explicit and incontestable evidence of the absurdity of the suggestion that the world is suffering from a dearth of money because of the demonetization of silver.

The following statement is interesting and instructive:

Statement of the silver coinage in the countries named, from 1851 to 1870.

England	$31,243,217
France	103,307,957
Germany (from 1857 to 1872)	167,805,000
United States	63,254,676
Total	365,610,850

Statement of the silver coinage in the countries named, from 1870 to 1890.

England	$82,306,352
France	70,578,588
Germany	107,632,000
Total	746,406,852

It thus appears that there was double as much silver coined in the four great commercial countries in the twenty years after 1870 as in the twenty years immediately preceding, every dollar of which retains a purchasing power equivalent to gold.

Does it not appear, then, to right-minded men that so far as the United States is concerned in responsibility for the demonetization of silver and the monetary disturbances of the past years on account of the fall in silver, it is a monstrous kilabaroo?

A friend of mine tells a story more suitable as an illustration in this connection than anything I can recall from history, fiction, or fable. A wag carried about a queer looking box to scare people with. He pretended there was a terrible animal in it that would eat people alive. He had it in New York on one occasion. The beholders asked him what it was. "A kilabaroo," he replied. "Where did it come from?" "It came from Africa." "What is its color?" "Green as jealousy." "What does it live on?" "It lives on snakes." "Where do you get the snakes." "I get them from my brother-in-law here in New York." "Where does he get them?" "Well, he gets them out of his imagination when he has delirium tremens." "Oh, then they are imaginary snakes?" "Oh, yes; it is an imaginary kilabaroo. There is nothing in the box, but it scares a great many people." [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, for fifteen years the advocates of gold have been claiming that they are the friends of an honest standard, and have been charging that the friends of silver are the advocates of a dishonest standard. This claim for themselves and this charge against us have been repeated so often and with such emphasis that they have produced an impression upon the public mind; and it is my purpose, on this occasion, to show if I can that they are entirely unfounded. Indeed, I realize that I must do this in order to justify my support of the pending bill, for I know perfectly well that it would be worse than folly for the American people to abandon a financial system which preserves the integrity of their standard and adopt one which insures its debasement. Neither the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] nor the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] can be more earnestly in favor of an honest standard than I am.

WHAT IS AN HONEST STANDARD?

But, Mr. Chairman, what is an honest standard? Certainly I can not consent to the definition of it given by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] in his speech last Friday, when he defined "standard money" in these words:

In my judgment, the main thing is to arrive at a proper comprehension of what is meant by the term standard money. What is standard money, Mr. Chairman? I define it to be money coined out of a substance the commercial value of which is exactly equal to the purchasing power of the money after it is coined. It will be seen that free and unlimited coinage is necessarily the essential feature of standard money.

I respectfully submit to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] that iron will fulfill his definition of standard money just as well as gold. If to-morrow Congress were to establish as our unit of value an iron dollar, consisting of an ounce of iron, there can be no reasonable doubt that an ounce of iron would be worth the iron dollar itself. Of course the dollar consisting of an ounce of iron would not be worth anything like as much as a dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold, but it would be worth neither more nor less than the iron in it. The mathematical axiom that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other is not more certain than that whatever can be converted into a dollar without cost will be worth a dollar. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asserts this to be true, for in opening the debate on this bill he said:

It must be conceded that under free and unlimited coinage of private silver bullion, after a sufficient time had elapsed to give an opportunity to get into full operation, there could be no material difference in the market value between 371¼ grains of fine silver in the form of bullion before coinage and 371¼ grains of silver coined into a standard silver dollar, for no owner of silver, here or abroad, would sell 371¼ grains of silver bullion for materially less than he could dispose of a silver dollar coined from such silver, when he could have his bullion converted into a silver dollar without cost to himself.

I leave these two distinguished gentlemen to reconcile this difference between them, while I propose the brief and simple definition that: The best standard money is that which is the most unchanging in its value. I take it that all thoughtful men who have studied this subject will readily agree to this definition; and if so, two points of difference are eliminated from this debate. I thoroughly agree with my friends on the other side as to the wisdom of having an honest standard, and they must, upon due reflection, thoroughly agree with me in my definition of an honest standard.

THE DIFFERENCE.

Our serious disagreement is this: They insist that gold is, and has been, stable in its value, and is, therefore, an honest standard, while I insist that for twenty years gold has steadily appreciated, and is therefore not an honest standard. If they are right on the question of fact—that is, if gold has been stable in its value—then the gold standard is an honest standard and ought to be maintained. On the other hand, if they are mistaken on the question of fact—that is, if gold has been appreciating for twenty years—then the gold standard is not an honest standard and ought to be abolished. Upon this proposition the ultimate decision of this controversy will depend. If we can not prove the appreciation of gold, we can not successfully assail the gold standard; because all of the ills which we ascribe to it flow from the one great evil of an appreciating money. But, sir, if we can prove the appreciation of gold, we thereby completely answer all of the arguments which our opponents have ever made, for they have never delivered a speech nor written a book nor published a pamphlet which has not been based upon the assumption that the value of gold has been stable, and if we can demonstrate this assumption to be false, their entire case falls to the ground.

HOW TO DETERMINE THE APPRECIATION OF GOLD.

How, Mr. Chairman, can we determine whether or not the value of gold has appreciated? It is certain that we can not determine it by using gold as our standard, because, of course, a thing must always be equal to itself; and no matter how high it rises or how low it falls, if it be treated as a standard, and all other things measured by it, the changes between it and other things will appear to have been brought about by a movement of the other things. It is not necessary for me to detain this House in exposing the fallacy of attempting to prove the stability of a standard by the standard itself. The question being whether or not there has been a change in the standard, the only possible method of deciding that question fairly and intelligently is to divest the substance which composes the standard of its quality as a standard, and then compare it with other commodities. Let us subject gold to this crucial test.

The relation between gold and other commodities, as exemplified by the level of general prices, was so clearly and so forcibly presented to the House by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] on Saturday last that I shall not attempt to add anything to what he has already said so well. I refrain from a further discussion of that phase of the question both because I could not hope to improve upon the manner in which the gentleman from Minnesota has discussed it, and also because our adversaries admit the fall in prices as evidenced by the Index Numbers, but claim that it is due to facts connected with commodities, and not to the appreciation of gold. With the fall admitted, it is only necessary for us to ascertain its cause, and this I shall endeavor to do by taking particular articles and showing that nothing will account for the fall in their price except the appreciation of gold.

Perhaps it will be proper, in order to avoid all misunderstanding as to my position, for me to say at the outset that I fully recognize that an increase in its supply without a corresponding increase in the demand for it, will inevitably reduce the price of any article. I also recognize that there frequently occurs such an increase in the production of particular articles as superinduces a fall in their price. But I regard it as most improbable that an overproduction could occur in all lines at the same time; and I regard it as well-nigh impossible that such an overproduction could continue through a long period of time. Certainly I can not accept such a theory without the most convincing proof of its correctness, and especially when the phenomenon which it is employed to explain can be explained upon another theory which is more probable in itself and more in harmony with the experience of mankind.

OVERPRODUCTION OF MANUFACTURED GOODS.

It would be difficult for any man to say that there has, or has not, been an overproduction of manufactured goods, because the data for such a calculation are so meager that no careful and conscientious investigator would feel much reliance in any judgment predicated upon them. Democrats, however, can not aver the overproduction of manufactured goods without flatly contradicting an argument which we have been making against the Republican party for years. We have declared from every stump and rostrum in America that under the system of high custom duties foreign goods have been excluded from our markets, and that the domestic manufacturers, secure against foreign competition, have regulated their production so as not to overstock our market. We have affirmed that syndicates, trusts, and combinations have been formed for the sole and only purpose of limiting production and maintaining prices. As for my part, I felt then, and I feel now, that our criticism was just, for repeatedly, when the output of their factories was sufficient to supply our home demand, I have seen the manufacturers close down their establishments and turn their operatives in idleness upon the public streets.

But, sir, a much stronger reason inducing me to believe that it is the appreciation of gold, and not the overproduction of commodities, which has produced the disastrous fall in prices is the fact that the fall is apparent nowhere throughout the world except in countries which measure prices in gold. Political economists have taught us that falling prices discourage production, while rising or stable prices encourage production; and, for a century, we have accepted this as an economic truth. We must, however, reject it now if we are to believe that overproduction explains the fall in prices; because the greatest overproduction appears in those countries where a continuous fall in prices has been the greatest, and no excessive production has occurred in those countries where prices have remained fairly stationary. If overproduction were really the evil that afflicts all gold-standard nations alike, that evil would have been remedied before this by curtailing production until it was made commensurate with consumption.

FARM PRODUCTS.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to the overproduction of manufactured goods, there is none at all in reference to the great agricultural products of wheat and cotton; for the statistics relating to them are so full and generally so accurate that we can draw our conclusions from them with the utmost confidence. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE], in the course of his excellent speech, demanded to know why cotton and wheat should be taken as the basis of comparison rather than corn and oats. The answer to that question is so obvious that I am astonished at his asking it. Our purpose being to ascertain whether or not the value of gold has appreciated, and it being true, as our gold-standard friends are constantly alleging, that the value of gold is fixed in the open markets of the world, it is plainly necessary for us to use in our comparison commodities whose prices are fixed in the same markets where the price of gold is fixed. It would be impossible for us to deduce anything like a satisfactory conclusion about the price of one article whose price is fixed in the markets of the world by comparing it with another article whose price is fixed in the local markets of a single country. The prices of corn and oats are fixed in local markets and under local conditions, and for that reason I do not use them as a basis of comparison. The prices of cotton and wheat are fixed in the open markets of the world, where the price of gold is fixed, and for that reason I do use them as a basis of comparison.

OVERPRODUCTION OF WHEAT.

In 1872 the price of wheat was $1.24 per bushel, and in 1894 it was 49 cents per bushel. Many gentlemen have argued that the chief reason for this great decline in the price of wheat is the reduction in transportation charges, but that argument is not pertinent, because the prices which I have given are the farm prices. The lower cost of transporting wheat from the farm to the export markets may be thought by some to account for its lower price in those markets, it is absolutely certain that it can not account for its lower price at the farm. Driven from this position, our gold standard friends next contend that the decline has been caused by the immense crops of late years; but this position is not more tenable than the other.

Our first crop to reach 500,000,000 bushels was the crop of 1882, which was 504,185,470 bushels. The crop of 1894—or perhaps I would better take the crop of 1893, as it makes a sharper contrast—the crop of 1893 was 396,131,725 bushels. That is to say, the wheat produced in 1893 was over 25 per cent less than in 1882. Our population had increased from 1882 to 1893 not less than 25 per cent, which of course created an enlarged demand, thus showing more people to eat wheat and less wheat to eat. If I should stop with a comparison based upon these two years, it might be suspected that I had picked them to suit my own purpose in the argument, and to free myself from that suspicion, as well as to make the argument more reliable, I will take the average of the six years beginning with 1882 and going forward to 1887 and compare it with the six years beginning with 1894 and going back to 1888.

The average crop of the first six years was 451,000,000 bushels, and the average crop of the second six years was 475,000,000 bushels, the difference in the average of the two periods being 24,000,000 bushels; or an increase of less than 6 per cent. During this same time that the production of wheat increased less than 6 per cent our population increased over 15 per cent, showing an increased percentage in the consumers of wheat more than twice as great as the increased percentage in the production of wheat, which conclusively establishes that there has been no overproduction of wheat. But we are told that while that is true of this country it is not true of other countries, and that the enormous crops in other countries have brought about the decline in the price of wheat. This explanation does not explain, because it is not true as a matter of fact. The wheat crop of the world in 1882 was greater than it was in 1893, and during the twelve years that intervened between 1882 and 1894 only four crops were greater than the crop of 1882 and eight crops were smaller, the average crop for the twelve years being 50,000,000 bushels less than the crop of 1882.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, with this decreased supply and an increased demand, the price of wheat ought to have been greater in 1893 than it was in 1882; but the Treasury statistics show that wheat was worth 88 cents per bushel in 1882 and only 53 cents per bushel in 1893. What is the explanation? We know that since 1882 there have been no special facts, such as improved methods of production, which have affected the price of wheat to any important extent, and that its price has been determined by its own supply and demand, coupled with the supply and demand for money. If the supply and demand for wheat had been the same in 1893 as in 1882, we know that there could have been no change in its price except such as ensued from a change in the value of money. And when we see that instead of the supply and demand remaining the same there has actually been an increased demand meeting a decreased supply, we know that there would have been an increase in its price if there had not been a still greater increase in the value of the money which measures its price.

LAW OF PRICE.

It will be perceived from this statement that I do not deny, nor do I attempt to discount, the great law of supply and demand. Indeed, I seek to establish my contention that the steady fall in the price of wheat through twenty years has been due to the constant appreciation of gold, by showing that this fall of price has been contrary to the conditions of supply and demand, and must consequently be attributed to some cause other than the conditions of supply and demand.

The trouble with our gold-standard friends is that they refuse to admit that there is any other cause, and blindly insist that its supply and demand alone determine the price of every commodity. They are almost as unreasonable as the fiatists, who iterate and reiterate that the volume of money controls all prices. The gold men and the fiatists are both wrong and equally wrong, because each takes into consideration only that element of price which supports his own theory of the question. It is certainly true that its supply and demand are potent factors in fixing the price of any commodity, but they are not the only factors. It is also true that the amount of money circulating in the markets where prices are fixed strongly influences but it does not entirely govern them. The correct statement of the principle is that "all other things remaining the same, supply and demand regulate prices"; and, stated in this way, the rule is not only correct, but it is universal in its application, and is as true of money as it is of merchandise. Assuming the volume of money and the demand for money to be fixed, then the price of each article will vary as the conditions of its supply and demand vary; or, assuming the supply and demand for any given article to be fixed, its price will vary with the variations in the volume of money as related to the demand for money; but in all cases the value of money must form one term in every equation of price. When we say that a certain article is worth so much, we simply mean that a given quantity of that article equals a given number of dollars. If the value of money rises the same number of dollars will procure more of the article; or if the value of money falls, it will require a greater number of dollars to procure the same quantity of the article.

It is for asserting this plain and natural law of political economy that we are charged with proposing an artificial system of high prices. We propose nothing of the kind; we are simply opposing an artificial system of low prices. We know that even with an ideal monetary system, under which the value of a dollar would never change, there would still be changes in supply and demand, and consequent changes in price, against which no legislation can prevail and against which none ought to be attempted; but our contention is that business men and farmers, who must incur the risk of such changes in prices as result from a change in the commodities which they produce or in which they deal, ought to be exempt from the changes in price which grow out of a change in the value of money.

OVERPRODUCTION OF COTTON.

An examination of cotton production and cotton prices discloses much the same condition as exists in regard to wheat. In 1872 the price of cotton averaged over 20 cents per pound, and in 1894 it averaged less than 7 cents per pound. I use the price for 1894 because the Statistical Abstract for 1895 has not yet been issued, and as I desire to use only official reports, I use the price of the last year officially reported. It may be objected that the comparison of a single commodity based on any two years is not reliable—an objection which I freely concede—and in order to avoid making the comparison too narrow I will take the average for the last twenty-two years and abide the judgment to be formed in that way. The average price of cotton since 1872 has been 11.5 cents per pound, as against 22.19 cents per pound in 1872, and the gold dollar, which in 1872 would buy only 4½ pounds of cotton, would have bought during the last twenty-two years an average of 11¼ pounds, showing an increase in the purchasing power of gold over cotton of more than 100 per cent.

Our gold-standard friends admit this ruinous fall in the price of cotton, but allege that it is due to its overproduction. We admit that there has been a marked increase in the production of cotton since 1873, but we insist that the extension in its use has been equally as great, and that the relative supply and demand are not essentially different now from what they were then. If I can substantiate this statement I suppose that all reasonable men will agree that it is not overproduction which has brought the price of cotton from an average of over 22 cents per pound in 1872 to an average of less than 7 cents per pound in 1894. How can we decide this question? By what test shall we determine whether there has been an overproduction of cotton? A very respectable authority on the subject says:

> It is evident that the proper way to judge of the supply of any unmanufactured product is by the number of weeks' supply for the use of the manufacturers in the market at the close of the season.

This test is not only as fair and as safe as has ever been proposed, but is probably as fair and as safe as can be devised; and with this for our guide, we not only fail to discover the overproduction of which we have heard so much, but we actually find an underproduction. I have here a table which shows the supply, the consumption, and the surplus of each year from 1871–72 to 1893–94:

Cotton—supply, consumption, and surplus.

Year.	Surplus at beginning of season.	Supply.	Consumption.	Price per pound.
	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.	Cents.
1871–72	2,578,000	6,277,000	6,312,000	22.19
1872–73	2,453,000	6,366,000	6,425,000	20.14

In constructing this table I have taken the price of cotton from the Statistical Abstract, and I have taken the supply, consumption, and surplus, except the last year, from a publication by Clapp & Co. I preferred this publication rather than the Senate report, because it gives the data as to the world, while the Senate report gives the consumption and surplus for only the United States and Europe.

This table shows that at the close of the cotton year of 1871–72 (and I will say in parenthesis that in the cotton trade the year closes on the 31st of August) the world's surplus was 2,453,000 bales, which was equal to about twenty weeks' supply for the factories, and which, with the single exception of 1874–75, was the largest number of weeks' supply on hand at the close of any season during the next twenty years. An inspection of this table will show that at the end of 1885–86, which was the first year after the war that cotton fell below an average of 10 cents per pound, the surplus on hand was only 1,800,000 bales, as against 2,453,000 bales for 1872–73.

Applying our rule, that the extent of overproduction is to be judged by the surplus at the end of the season, we find that in 1885–86, as compared with 1871–72, there had really been an underproduction of 33 per cent. This would lead us to expect a corresponding rise in the price, but instead of that we find a fall in the price from an average of over 20 cents per pound in 1871–72 to an average of less than 10 cents per pound for 1885–86. Passing down this table to the year of 1892–93, we find a surplus exceeding for the first time since 1874–75 the surplus of 1872–73—the surplus of 1892–93 being 3,540,000 bales. This surplus of 3,540,000 bales, however, constituted a smaller number of weeks' supply than the 2,453,000 bales surplus in 1871–72, and yet, sir, the smaller surplus of 1892–93 commanded less than 9 cents per pound, while the larger surplus of 1872–73 commanded over 20 cents per pound.

Our argument is not more conclusive when tested by the number of weeks' supply on hand at the close of each season than when tested by the per cent of the crop which remained as a surplus. A glance at the above table will show that the world's total supply for 1871–72 was 6,272,000 bales, of which 2,453,000 remained in the market at the close of the season, showing a surplus of about 35 per cent. The world's total supply for 1885–86 was 9,580,000 bales, of which 1,800,000 bales remained on the market at the close of the season, showing a surplus of about 20 per cent; or, if we take the great crop of 1891–92—the greatest ever produced in the history of the world up to that year—the total supply was 13,190,000 bales, of which 3,500,000 bales remained in the market at the end of the season, showing a surplus of less than 27 per cent, against a surplus of 35 per cent in 1872–73. In the face of these plain and incontrovertible facts I am unable to understand how any unprejudiced mind can still insist that the supply of cotton has exceeded the demand for it.

Not only, sir, do the facts completely disprove the theory of overproduction, but the highest authority, or, if not the highest, certainly one of the highest, in the cotton trade of this country has recently declared that an overproduction does not exist. I have here the report of Mr. Alfred B. Sheperson, who is connected with the New York Cotton Exchange, and who was employed by a Senate committee as an expert to investigate this very question. He follows an elaborate examination of tables giving the supply, consumption, and surplus of cotton with this statement:

> An examination of the number of the week's supply of cotton in the European markets at the end of each season does not confirm the opinion held by many persons that in recent years there has been a great overproduction of cotton.

Thus we present you the demonstration of figures, supplemented by the testimony of experts, that the world's demand for cotton has increased as fast as the world's supply of it; and therefore the fall in its price could not have resulted from changed conditions of supply and demand. The trouble is not in our cotton; it is in the money which expresses the price of our cotton. The world has not produced more cotton than it has needed, but the world has needed more gold than it has produced. The same amount of gold now buys more than double as much cotton as formerly, not because there is more cotton than enough to supply the demand for cotton; but because there is not enough gold to supply the demand for gold. If gold were worth the same to-day as it was twenty-two years ago the price of cotton now would not be greatly different from what it was then, for the last crop was not as large in proportion to the demand for it as the crop of 1872–73. Cotton is worth nearly the same in Mexico to-day as it was in 1873, and though we are told that the money in which the Mexicans pay 20 cents a pound for cotton is only worth 50 cents on the dollar, we know that the Mexican dollar is worth as much now, of everything except gold, as it was twenty years ago.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that all fair-minded and candid men will reject the explanation that the fall in the price of wheat and cotton is attributable to their overproduction, because I am sure that all fair-minded and thoughtful men who will examine the question must conclude that these commodities have not been overproduced. With the overproduction argument rejected, it only remains for me to consider the other explanation that the fall in the price of wheat and cotton is attributable to cheaper methods of producing them.

This explanation is insufficient both in point of theory and in point of fact. The Ricardian theory that the cost of production determines the price of an article is not assented to by any eminent thinker of this age. It is perfectly true that a cheaper cost of production may influence price by influencing the extent of production, but in no other way. To illustrate what I mean, let us suppose that some new invention would enable 100 men to produce double as much of an article in a given time as they could formerly. This would probably reduce the price of the article—indeed, it would be certain to do so unless the invention should be too expensive, in which event it would not be used, and the old status would not be changed—but the fall in its price would proceed not from its cheaper production, but from its greater production; or, to phrase it differently, the supply being doubled, if the demand remained the same, a fall in the price would follow.

No commodity could furnish a more conclusive refutation of the doctrine that the cost of production determines price than the precious metals themselves. We all know that a large part of the gold in the world was produced, weight for weight, more cheaply than silver, and nobody supposes that the cost of producing gold and silver has, ounce for ounce, been more than 10 to 1, and yet, while it has cost as much to produce 10 ounces of silver as 1 ounce of gold, 1 ounce of gold is worth as much in the markets of the world to-day as 31 ounces of silver. There are many other proofs and illustrations which could be adduced to sustain my contention, but I forbear to dwell upon them, and shall content myself with reenforcing my own opinion by a quotation from the best book ever written by an American—and one of the best ever written by anybody—on the subject of "Money." In his great work Professor Walker says:

> Cost of production only affects value by affecting the actual or potential supply. A lower cost of production allows under given conditions a larger supply to be marketed. The higher cost of production diminishes the supply. This is the only way in which a change in the cost of production can influence existing values.

So much for the theory upon which these gentlemen allege a cheaper production as the cause of lower prices. But, sir, even if their theory were good, it is not supported by the facts. If we would agree that the cheaper production of cotton and wheat would reduce their price, it is not possible to prove their cheaper production. Not only would they be unable to prove it, but we are able to disprove it.

The cost of producing any article consists, first, of the capital invested; second, of the labor bestowed upon it; and third, of the incidental expenses, such as taxes, repairs, and insurance. Our census reports are not compiled so that we can ascertain either the capital invested, the labor bestowed, or the incidental expenses incurred in producing the particular articles of cotton and wheat; but they are compiled in such a manner as to show the entire capital invested, and the number of laborers engaged in agricultural pursuits, and we can approximately judge as to what part of the whole was employed in producing cotton and wheat. There being no census of the years of 1872 and 1894, we are compelled to take the census of 1870 and 1890. This, however, fully answers the purposes of a fair argument. According to the census of 1870, the value of the farms, including lands, fences, and buildings, was $9,262,803,861, the value of the implements and machinery was $336,878,429, and the value of live stock was $1,525,276,457, making a total of less than $11,200,000,000.

The Census report itself states that these were currency prices and that currency was at a discount of a fraction more than 25 per cent. Reducing the currency prices to a specie basis, the total capital invested in farming, including lands, houses, fences, live stock, and implements of all kinds, was less than $8,500,000,000. The number of laborers engaged in agricultural pursuits in 1870 was 5,922,471. In 1890 the capital invested in farms, live stock, and implements was $16,000,000,000, and the laborers engaged in farming were 8,565,920. Thus we find that the capital invested was nearly 100 per cent greater, and the number of laborers was nearly 50 per cent greater, in 1890 than in 1870. The exact figures as to taxes, insurance, and repairs I am not able to give, but no man will dispute that this expense was nearly double as much on $16,000,000,000 in 1890 as it was on $8,500,000,000 in 1870. We have, then, an increase in the capital of 100 per cent, an increase in the labor of 50 per cent, and an increase of 100 per cent in taxes, insurance, and repairs. And so, sir, to preserve the proportion between the cost of production and the selling price of farm products, they ought to have been worth nearly twice as much in 1894 as in 1872, but the reports of the Agricultural Department show that they were worth $1,890,000,000, in 1894, as against $1,625,472,543 in 1872.

Reducing the crop of 1872 to a specie basis, it was, in round numbers, $1,400,000,000, which shows an increase in 1894 over 1872 of only $490,000,000; and this increase was in corn, oats, hay, and other products whose prices are entirely local, and therefore do do not indicate the rise or fall in the value of gold. Looking to those farm products whose prices are regulated in the markets of the world and which therefore fairly measure the appreciation of gold, we find that the wheat crop of 1894, which was 460,000,000 bushels, was worth only $225,000,000, while the crop of 1872, which was only 249,000,000 bushels, was worth $310,000,000; or, the crop of 1894, though twice as large as the crop of 1872, brought the farmers who produced it less money than the crop of 1872. The cotton crop of 1872, though less than half as much as the crop of 1894, brought $301,087,500 as against $263,000,000 for the crop of 1894.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, I think clearly demonstrate that neither the overproduction of cotton and wheat nor their cheaper productions could have caused the fall in their price; and if I have shown that neither overproduction nor cheaper production accounts for the fall in the price, I have excluded every possible explanation except the appreciation of gold. Not only is it true, sir, that gold has more than doubled its purchasing power over cotton and wheat during the last twenty-two years, but the same is true of every commodity whose price is fixed in the open markets of the world, and whose conditions of supply and demand are relatively the same now as they were in 1872. I could easily make this statement good by a comparison, article by article, such as I have made in respect to cotton and wheat, but this would be a useless tax upon my strength and upon the patience of the House, as such proof would simply be cumulative.

THE REMEDY.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what is the remedy for this disastrous fall in prices? Our gold-standard friends propose none at all, and complacently assure us that falling prices are a national blessing. This may, or it may not, be true. It is true when the fall in price results from a diminished cost of production, because such a fall may benefit consumer and producer alike and become a distinct gain for humanity and civilization; but it is not true when the fall in price is due to an increase in the value of money, because such a fall benefits none except those who enjoy fixed incomes, and is an unmitigated curse to any nation. I shall not consume my time in arguing to this House that an appreciating unit of value is unjust to a large majority of our people and injurious to the best interests of our country, for I have never known a man in public speech or in private conversation who would deny it.

I know usurers who, to serve their selfishness, would multiply the unit by five every ten years, and I know spendthrifts who, to relieve their embarrassments, would divide the unit by ten every five years; but even these extreme types, deferring to common sense and common honesty, do not dare to ask what they desire; and like all other men profess a solicitude to preserve the stability of the unit. Amid the endless diversity and conflict of opinion on this subject that is the one point upon which we all agree. The gold-standard advocates, the friends of the double standard, and even the paper fiatists, all join in declaring that the first and most indispensable requisite of a sound monetary system is an invariable unit of value.

Believing that the great fall in prices during the last twenty-two years is largely due to an appreciation of money, and believing that this appreciation will continue under a single gold standard, we propose, as a remedy for the evil, a restoration of the double standard. In making this proposal we are actuated by no special predilection for silver, and we favor its free coinage purely as a means to an end. We know that the stability of our money can not be preserved by basing the unit exclusively upon gold, but we believe it can be preserved by basing the unit upon both gold and silver.

WHY WE FAVOR THE DOUBLE STANDARD.

We favor the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with the free and unlimited coinage of each, because we believe that together they will make our standard of value more stable than either one of them alone can make it; and in this opinion we are strongly confirmed by one of the ablest and one of the most ardent of all the gold monometallists. In that passage which has been quoted so often, but which can not be quoted too often, Professor Jevons says:

> A little reflection must show that MM. Wolowski and Courcelle-Seneuil are quite correct in urging that a compensatory or, as I should prefer to call it, equilibratory action goes on under the French currency law, and tends to maintain both gold and silver more steady in value than they would otherwise be. * * * At any moment the standard of value is doubtless one metal or the other, and not both; yet the fact that there is an alteration tends to make each vary much less than it would otherwise do. It can not prevent both metals from falling or rising in value compared with other commodities, but it can throw variations of supply and demand over a larger area, instead of leaving each metal to be affected merely by its own accidents.
> Imagine two reservoirs of water, each subject to independent variations of supply and demand. In the absence of any connecting pipe, the level of the water in each reservoir will be subject to its own fluctuation only. But if we open a connection, the water in both will assume a certain mean level, and the effects of any excessive supply or demand will be distributed over the whole area of both reservoirs. The mass of the metals, gold and silver, circulating in western Europe in late years, is exactly represented by the water in these reservoirs, and the connecting pipe is the law of the 7th Germinal, an XI, which enables one metal to take the place of the other as an unlimited legal tender.

If Professor Jevons is right, and a unit based upon both metals is the most stable, then, sir, the double standard must be the best. Even if it is not as good as it ought to be, it can not be worse than the single gold standard; for the only system which can possibly be worse than one under which the unit doubles its value in twenty years is one under which it doubles its value in a shorter time. We do not claim that under a double standard the value of money will never vary; but we do claim that the variation will be very much less under it than under a single gold standard. Curiously enough, our opponents never address themselves to this view of the question, but simply assume as a fatal objection to our proposition that this Government alone can not maintain a parity between the two metals at any ratio fixed by law. The vice of this objection—and it is a vice which characterizes every argument which I have ever heard or read on the other side of this question—is that it places the parity between different kinds of money above stability in the value of money.

We do not contend that the free coinage of silver will prevent all variations between the metals. We know that their ratio varied when the mints stood open to both alike, and we expect that the ratio will vary if the mints should be opened again; but we believe that the open mint of a great country like ours will give a steadiness to their relative values, when once properly fixed, sufficient for all of the practical purposes of commerce. We know that from 1687 to 1873 the ratio between gold and silver oscillated, but through all that one hundred and fifty years the ratio never fell below 14 to 1 nor rose above 16 to 1, except in the three years of 1808, 1812, and 1813. We concede that similar fluctuations may occur again, but we unhesitatingly affirm that it is better to use both of the metals and suffer a slight fluctuation between them than to use one of them and suffer a wide fluctuation between it and all forms of property. In other words, Mr. Chairman, while it is important to preserve the parity between gold and silver, it is infinitely more important to preserve the parity between money and property. We do not procure gold in order to buy silver, nor do we procure silver in order to buy gold; but we procure either of them or both of them for the purpose of buying other and more useful kinds of property. I believe in parity, but I believe still more in stability, and if I am compelled to choose between parity without stability and stability without parity, my choice would be stability above every other consideration; and I would not hesitate one moment to take silver monometallism, if with it I could obtain stability.

SILVER MONOMETALLISM.

Why this undefined and indefinable dread of silver monometallism, if it be true that silver is a more stable metal than gold? Neither silver monometallism nor any other kind of metallism can be an evil if it furnishes a stable measure of value. I do not hesitate to avow my belief that the most stable standard is the best without reference to the metal which composes it, and I prefer it whether it shall be gold alone or silver alone or whether it shall be both gold and silver. I go further than this. I would unhesitatingly reject both of the metals and adopt a paper standard if a paper standard were more stable than a metallic one; for in some respects paper makes a better money than either gold or silver. It costs less labor to produce it and it is more convenient to use; but it can not be safely adopted as a standard, because the history of the world admonishes us that no nation can preserve its value when it is employed in unlimited quantities and to the exclusion of the precious metals.

Upon the same principle that I oppose the gold standard because it is an appreciating one, I oppose the paper standard because it would be a depreciating one, and I advocate a standard of both gold and silver because I believe it will be a stable one. I plant myself upon the broad and unassailable ground that no system with a variable unit can be a good one and no system with an invariable one can be a bad one, without the slightest reference to the material out of which the unit is coined. Gentlemen can not deny this without denying a proposition affirmed by every respectable economist who has ever considered the subject and without denying all they have themselves been saying for the last fifteen years. I have heard some of them argue against silver, and I have heard many of them denounce it, but I have heard none of them offer any serious objection to it except that it fluctuates.

If it is true, Mr. Chaiaman, as I have endeavored to show, that gold has doubled its value in the last twenty years, then it must be true that silver has varied very little, if any, in its value; and if we need an international agreement at all, we need it to keep down the price of gold and not to keep up the price of silver. If these gentlemen have been sincere in objecting to silver upon the ground that it is a fluctuating measure of value, they must object to gold, because the proof is that gold has fluctuated vastly more than silver. Or perhaps they think that it is a crime to advocate a money which goes down, without realizing that it is still more criminal to advocate a money which goes up. If money must go either way it is better that it should go down than up; for falling money means rising prices, while rising money means falling prices, and all men know that rising prices are better for the country than falling prices.

SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

But gentlemen exclaim that silver monometallism would degrade this country to a level with Mexico and the other silver-using countries of the world; thus assuming that the condition which exists in Mexico and other silver-using countries is traceable to their silver standard. The least reflection must convince any man that such an argument is utterly fallacious. The dullest man ought to know that the general condition existing in any country is the result of many different factors, and that a comparison between the general condition existing in a silver-standard country and the general condition existing in a gold-standard country can only help us to understand the effect of the two different monetary systems when the comparison relates to countries which are substantially alike in other respects. If, however, it is desired to study the effect of the gold and the silver standard as exhibited in the United States and Mexico, perhaps a fair lesson could be learned by comparing the two countries from 1840 to 1860, and then again from 1870 to 1890. Our advancement between 1870 and 1890 has been much less than between 1840 and 1860, while the advancement of Mexico between 1870 and 1890 has been much greater than between 1840 and 1860. Now, sir, if the gold standard has really promoted our growth and retarded the growth of Mexico, how could it happen that our progress since the adoption of the gold standard has been less than it was before we adopted the gold standard, while Mexico's progress has never been so great as during the past twenty years?

If instead of comparing Mexico with this country, which is so dissimilar in all other things as well as its financial system, we will compare it with some country closely resembling it in population, soil, climate, education, religion, and civilization, and having a gold standard, then we may hope to acquire some valuable instruction on the point at issue; for it is fair to suppose that if two countries are alike in all respects except one that this one difference may properly be considered as the cause of their different progress. If you would really know whether the condition of a country is worse under a silver standard than under a gold standard, we can obtain some light on that subject by comparing Mexico and Brazil, which are so much alike in their soil, climate, and population, and which differ in their monetary systems. There is no candid man living to-day who knows anything about conditions existing in these two countries who does not know that, judged by the progress of the last twenty years, Mexico has far outstripped Brazil. I have here an article contributed by the Mexican minister, Mr. Romero, to the June number of the North American Review, in which he says:

> We have more stability of prices, wages, rents, etc. Although our wages are low, there has been in recent years a marked tendency to their increase. Our factories are not only in operation, but they are being greatly extended, and new plants and industries are being established. Instead of dismissing our laborers, we find occupation for them all, and we need to import them for work to be done in some localities, and as our laborers find occupation and increased wages, we have no strikes.

Not only is the condition of Mexico, as described in this article, better than the condition of Brazil, and better than any gold-standard country on earth situated as Mexico is, but it is better even than the condition of many gold-standard countries having a higher civilization. Nor are the development and extension of her industries and her commerce the only advantages which Mexico enjoys in comparison with Brazil. The silver standard of Mexico is stable and admirably fulfills its part in the progress of her people, while the monetary system of Brazil, though it is a gold standard with a paper circulation, has for years been so unstable that no man could calculate what it would cost him to perform a contract two years from the time he made it.

If you think the comparison between Mexico and Brazil is unfair, perhaps you will admit the justice of a comparison between India and Egypt—India having a silver standard and Egypt a gold standard, and each having conditions of soil and climate not greatly dissimilar. If the gold standard is the cause of prosperity and the silver standard is the source of adversity, then Egypt ought to be more prosperous than India, but nobody will ask any well-informed man to believe that it is. Everybody who knows anything knows that during the last fifteen years India has progressed at an incomparably better rate than Egypt. Or if these two comparisons are not considered a sufficient test, let us compare Japan and Turkey—Japan being on a silver basis and Turkey on a gold basis. Not only has Japan so far surpassed Turkey in the past twenty years as to make a comparison between them seem almost ridiculous, but Japan's progress is proportionately greater than any gold-standard country on earth, not even excepting our own.

I desire to be clearly understood in this connection. I am not insisting that there is any special virtue in silver as such, nor any special vice in gold as such. I am simply showing that silver-standard countries have prospered more than gold-standard countries of like situation. That this is true is in perfect accord with the soundest laws of monetary science. The silver-standard countries have been living under a financial system whose unit of value has been fairly stable, and the gold-standard countries have been living under a financial system whose unit has been constantly appreciating. For this reason prices in silver-standard countries have not suffered any serious fall, while the fall in gold-standard countries has been such as to destroy all profits in agricultural and commercial pursuits. Under stable prices the silver-using countries have prospered, while falling prices in the gold-standard countries have been crushing their enterprising and energetic citizens, to enrich a class which Mr. Carlisle once denounced as the "idle holders of idle capital."

LABOR ARGUMENT.

The gold advocates lay great stress upon the fact that the wages of labor in this country are better than in silver-standard countries, and seek to impress us with the belief that this is a consequence of our gold standard. I do not myself attach the slightest value to comparisons of this kind, because I know that labor is more completely subject to its immediate environments than anything else. I know that the rate of wages in the same employment differs greatly even in adjacent States. The wages paid in Connecticut are very different from those paid in Maine, and the wages paid in Massachusetts are very different from those paid in either Connecticut or Maine. But, while I conceive a comparison of this kind more apt to mislead us than to lead us right, it must be deemed as good on one side as on the other, and since our gold-standard friends so constantly declaim about the great difference in Chinese and American wages, it is not improper for me to invite your attention to some other instances.

In the first place I would ask them to explain how it was that when we had the double standard up to 1873 we paid better wages than England, which has been on a gold standard since 1816. Or, coming to the present time, how will they explain that Mexico, which is a silver-standard country, pays better wages than Egypt, which is a gold-standard country? If the gold standard is such a benefit to the laboring man, why is it that the laborers of gold-standard Italy are in such a deplorable condition—so deplorable that in their towns and cities workmen possessing fair skill are compelled to buy not only second-hand clothes but second-hand food as well. The very coffee grounds from the tables of the rich are sold as a luxury to industrious men, and through all that magnificent valley of the Po—the richest land in Europe—the condition of both rural and urban labor is more wretched than the condition of the Southern slave ever was. And in Belgium, a rich and commercial gold-standard country, skilled mechanics gladly work for wages which are lower than similar grades of labor receive in Mexico.

This argument that a gold standard ought to be maintained for the benefit of the wage earner is a discreditable piece of demagogy, and is urged most vehemently by men who have never been known to sympathize with labor in any effort to ameliorate its condition. Many of those who have heretofore defended the rifle and the bayonet as a proper answer to the laborers' appeal for better wages are now protesting that everybody ought to be satisfied so long as the laborer is well rewarded for his toil. Not only is this argument demagogical, but it is too transparent to deceive intelligent workingmen, for they know that wages are simply the price of labor and are controlled by the same economic laws that control all other prices. They do not respond as quickly to influences, either good or evil, as the more perishable commodities, but in the end the wages of labor must share with the product of labor the fall in all prices which results from the appreciation of money. In the nature of things it could not be otherwise. The selling price of every article must be sufficient to cover the expense of producing it and return a profit to the producers, or else sooner or later its production must cease. The first item that must be met out of the money received from the sale of goods must be the fixed charges, such as taxes, insurance, rent, and interest on such borrowed capital as may be used. After these obligations have been discharged the remainder is then a fund to be divided between the owners of the plant and their laborers. It can hardly be expected that employers will be willing to forego their dividends in order that their employees may receive good wages. All that could be expected of the most generous employer would be that he should permit his profits and the wages of his employees to fall pari passu.

If the income from a business twenty-two years ago was $100,000 above the fixed charges, and was equally divided between wages and dividends, and if the same establishment now has an income of only $50,000, it is reasonable to suppose that it is still divided between the owners of the plant and the men who operate it, netting a clear loss to both the wage earners and the capitalist. To make my meaning even clearer, I will state that in 1890 this country produced commodities valued at $11,000,000,000; and in 1894 we produced less than $8,000,000,000, the fall being more in the price than in the quantity. But whatever may have caused the fall, it is absurd to suppose that labor received as much for producing $8,000,000,000 worth of goods in 1894 as it did for producing $11,000,000,000 worth in 1890. The commodities produced in 1894 and sold for $8,000,000,000 would have fetched at the prices prevailing in 1873 not less than $16,000,000,000, and will anybody ask an intelligent American laborer to believe that labor received as many dollars for producing $8,000,000,000 worth of commodities as it would have received for producing the same commodities if they could have been sold for $16,000,000,000? It is true that the rate of daily wages has been maintained in some branches of industry, but this is only true in those branches in which labor has greatly increased its skill; as where a few laborers now really produce more goods than a greater number of laborers formerly did. In some industries there have been such improvements in machinery that five men can now produce with a machine as much as fifteen formerly produced, and in this way the wages of the men who are still employed have been maintained and have occasionally been increased.

But in such employments many of the men who once found places are now idle; and though the individual laborers who work may even receive better daily wages, yet labor receives less compensation. The fifteen men before the improvement in machinery may have worked for $2 per day, making the total payment for labor $30 per day. Now the five men who, with the assistance of the new machine, can produce the same amount of goods, might be receiving $3 per day, which would make a total payment to labor of $15, or only half of what it was. It is plain to any man who will think on the subject for a moment that there may be a vast difference between the daily wages of a laborer who can find employment and the wages of labor which must comprehend a great number of unemployed laborers.

Descending from this general argument to a particular case, let us suppose that a cotton mill was established in 1872, costing $400,000, of which $200,000 was borrowed to run for twenty-five years. The capacity of such a mill would have been, say, 2,000 bales of cotton per annum. That cotton in 1872 would have cost the mill $110 a bale, or $220,000 for 2,000 bales. These 2,000 bales of cotton could then be converted into a finished product worth $450,000. Subtracting $220,000, the cost of the raw material, from the $450,000 received for the finished product, there was left $230,000 to meet fixed charges, pay wages, and declare dividends. Let us suppose that the fixed charges, including taxes, insurance, and interest on the $200,000 borrowed, would amount to $30,000, leaving $200,000 for wages and dividends.

Now, let us also suppose that that mill is as good in all respects to-day as it was in 1872, and that it still consumes 2,000 bales of cotton. That 2,000 bales of cotton to-day will cost $80,000, and can be converted into a finished product worth $160,000. Subtracting $80,000, the cost of the raw material, from the $160,000 received for the finished product, there is left $80,000 to meet fixed charges, pay wages, and declare dividends. The fixed charges are as much to-day as they were twenty-two years ago. The insurance is no less, the rate of interest, being fixed when the $200,000 was borrowed, remains the same, and the taxes, if anything, are greater; but estimating the fixed charges still to be $30,000, and subtracting that sum from the $80,000 left after paying for the raw material, the mill would now have $50,000 to pay wages and declare dividends. It is inconceivable that the labor in that establishment could be paid as much out of the $50,000 now as it was out of the $200,000 in 1873; and the mills which have attempted to pay the same wages out of their smaller receipts have passed into bankruptcy and their operatives are idle.

It is true, as Mr. Carlisle himself declared in his Memphis speech, that labor organizations have contributed powerfully toward maintaining the rate of daily wages, but they have not been able to control the number of men who should be employed nor the number of days which each employee is permitted to work. Three years ago I saw a very pointed illustration of how labor may suffer without its daily wages being changed. For some time after Mr. Cleveland's inauguration the Public Printer, who was a Republican, appointed many Democrats to places in the Printing Office without dismissing the Republicans, until the number of men was double as many as the work required. But the expenditures for that service were kept within the appropriation by allowing many of the printers to work only every other day. The management of many extensive corporations pursue this same policy, and after running on full time for a part of the year and filling such orders as have been placed with them, they then reduce their expenses, not by reducing the wages, but by reducing the number of their men. It is a mockery to tell a man who finds employment only half of his time that he is as well off as he was when he was continuously employed, simply because his daily wages are the same; for the question which most vitally concerns the workingman is not his daily, but his annual, earnings.

Whenever the manufacturer receives less for what his laborers make, he will pay his laborers less for making it. Do I need to tell this House that the farmers of the South can not pay farm hands the same wages for raising 8-cent cotton as for raising 18-cent cotton? Do the Representatives from the great wheat-producing States of the West imagine that their constituents can pay their laborers as much for raising 40-cent wheat as they could for raising 80-cent wheat? Mr. Chairman, no socialism is more dangerous than that which teaches labor to believe that capital can continue to pay undiminished wages out of a diminishing profit fund.

I shudder to contemplate the future of my country if the fall of prices is to continue through this and the next generation. Already farming has been stripped of half its charm and all its profit; merchandising has ceased to be a risk and has become a certain loss; and manufacturing only escapes the general ruin through the favoritism of an unjust protective tariff. Thousands of men who once found agreeable occupation on the farms are crowding into our already overcrowded towns and cities, and when the farmers leave their farms, the merchant must close his store and the manufacturer his factory. In that evil day the farm hand, the merchant's clerk, and the factory operative will all be compelled to join that vast army of the unemployed from whose discontented ranks the anarchist recruits his pestilent society.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask that the gentleman from Texas have twenty minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. The general debate will close within an hour.

Mr. BRUMM. We can extend the hour for the recess.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. You can not keep members here after 5 o'clock.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I object. There are other gentlemen who desire to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Maryland.

[Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill H. R. 2904 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and that at 10 o'clock another recess be taken until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, exclusively for the consideration of House bill 2904, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I understood that an order had already been made for this.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has not been made as yet.

Mr. BAILEY. Did not the order adopted the other day contemplate this?

Mr. DINGLEY. The order was not made for the evening session.

Mr. BAILEY. The order as made contemplated the consideration of the bill up to the time of taking a vote upon it. However that may be, I make no objection. But I desire to emphasize the fact that every request—and there were several—to extend the time of Republicans has been granted, while the only request made in behalf of a Democrat for an extension beyond the hour has been denied.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is an individual matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and at 10 o'clock the House take a recess until 10.30 to-morrow morning, for debate only on the bill H. R. 2904 in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, will please act as Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DAYTON for ten days, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the unanimous consent already given, the House will now stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reconvened at 8 p. m., Mr. PAYNE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the pending proposition is to substitute a measure providing for the free coinage of silver for House bill No. 2904, which was passed to meet two existing emergencies; first, to secure needed additional revenue, and, second, to replenish the gold reserve from time to time, in order to confirm the good faith of the Government as set forth in the acts of Congress authorizing the issue of the legal-tender notes commonly called "greenbacks," and more especially to maintain the act of January 14, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments on January 1, 1869, the promise of which was in a great part responsible for the wonderful increase of property and wealth of the nation which continued almost uninterruptedly until 1893.

I was, and am in favor of House bill No. 2904 as it passed this House, not because it was a curative measure, but one intending to meet an emergency in response to the urgent appeal of the President of the United States. No one expects the bill as now presented to us in the form of a silver free coinage substitute will or can become a law at this session, hence I will not detain the House by discussing the merits or demerits of a measure proposing the free coinage of silver, but as the substitute brings before us the whole question of the condition of the Treasury, the status of the gold reserve, as well as the currency situation generally, I prefer as my contribution to this debate to submit some considerations looking to extricating ourselves from the dilemmas confronting us.

All good citizens desire the general prosperity of the people; hence all good citizens should favor such legislation as will best subserve that end.

It is impossible to secure unanimity, but under ordinary circumstances the judgment of the majority is finally concurred in, and the more freely if the methods invoked have been suggested or controlled by the intelligent portion of the community.

The present situation presents an anomaly. A widespread and apparently radical difference of opinion exists as to the relation of gold and silver to each other and to our currency. On the one side appears to be gathered the moneyed and property interests of the country and on the other appear to be gathered not only a large portion of the agricultural element, but all those who for any cause are discontented with the present order or any order of things.

There is also a widespread anxiety existing in regard to the gold reserve now necessarily held to redeem legal-tender notes, which condition is intensified by the fact that gold no longer flows into the Treasury from the custom-house, and hence the urgent claim that the legal-tender notes shall be retired.

I had the honor on December 12, 1895, soon after this Congress met, to introduce three very brief bills, the texts of which I shall incorporate as part of my remarks, but their substance I shall explain as I proceed:

A bill (H. R. 1431) to refund the outstanding United States and Treasury notes with bonds bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after January 1, 1896, the United States notes (commonly called "greenbacks") now outstanding to the amount of $346,681,016, issued under the acts of February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863, and the United States Treasury notes payable in coin now outstanding to the amount of $144,495,280, issued for the purchase of silver bullion under the act of Congress approved July 14, 1890, shall be fundable, at the pleasure of the holder, into bonds of the United States, payable in lawful money, bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, payable quarterly, to the registered holder thereof.

The principal of said bonds shall be payable at the pleasure of the Government, but only after all interest-bearing debt of the United States carrying a higher rate of interest and payable in coin shall have matured and been paid.

The bonds herein provided for shall, until finally paid, be reconvertible into the same character of notes surrendered, and all exchanges shall be in sums of not less than $1,000, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and subject to the provisions hereinafter provided.

When any of the aforesaid bonds shall be presented to the Treasury for reexchange into the notes into which they are hereby made convertible, the interest accrued thereon for the expired portion of the then current quarter, and the interest that shall thereafter accrue until the notes shall again be presented for conversion into the bonds herein provided for, shall inure for the benefit of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish the necessary rules and regulations under which such notes shall be surrendered for conversion into such bonds, so that the party receiving the bonds shall pay to the Treasury the amount of interest which may have accrued on the then current quarter.

The notes herein made fundable and reconvertible shall continue to possess all the qualities now provided by law, except that on and after March 1, 1896, they shall no longer be receivable for customs nor redeemable nor exchangeable at the Treasury of the United States except by or for the bonds herein provided for.

A bill (H. R. 1453) requiring all duties on imported goods after March 1, 1896, shall be paid in gold coin, and repealing all acts inconsistent, etc.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after March 1, 1896, all duties on imported goods shall be paid in gold coin, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

A bill (H. R. 1426) to increase the circulation of national-bank currency and to reduce the taxes thereon.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter national banks now organized or hereafter organized shall be entitled to receive, under the provisions of section 10 of an act to enable banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes, approved July 12, 1882, from the Comptroller of the Currency, circulating notes of different denominations equal in amount to 100 per cent of the current market value, not exceeding par, of the United States bonds deposited under sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 2. That hereafter the taxes to be paid upon the average amount of notes in circulation of any national-bank association shall be at the rate of one-eighth of 1 per cent each half year.

It appears to me that these three bills, although independent, are in harmony with each other and in combination present a scheme at least helpful toward the end desired by all, viz, a sound basis for our currency, carefully avoiding all questions upon which honest differences of opinion may exist as to gold and silver, the maintenance of the parity between the metals, the volume of money needed for business purposes, etc., and largely eliminating the danger of recurring panics born of fear as to the future of the gold reserve and questions of redemption.

To proceed with a little more detail, let me say that H. R. 1431 is framed to accomplish several objects, but all related to the one subject.

It provides for the conditional funding of the United States legal-tender notes (commonly called greenbacks) and the United States Treasury notes payable in coin, issued for the purchase of silver bullion under act of July 14, 1890, into a bond payable in lawful money and bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. The prime object of this conditional funding is to wipe out the necessity for maintaining any gold reserve for the purpose of redeeming these notes now outstanding and which, under the specie-resumption act of January 14, 1875, are payable on demand in "coin," which has been universally accepted as meaning gold coin, confirmed by the uniform practice of the Government since its foundation.

The act of May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes," authorized the reissue of any of these notes when received in the Treasury from any source. The object and intent of that law was to prevent any contraction in the currency by final resumption and cancellation.

This was prior to the date (January 1, 1879) when the specie-resumption act went into effect, and therefore referred especially to legal-tender notes coming into the Treasury in the ordinary course of business, although the terms of the act are equally applicable now, when, by the changed condition of the revenue from surplus to deficiency, legal-tender notes are presented at the Treasury for exchange into gold for export to meet the adverse balance of trade mainly resulting from the reduction of duties by the Wilson tariff bill, which, having been framed (as is claimed) in the interest of the people, brought panic and desolation to the manufacturing industries of the country and hunger and distress to the masses of our working people.

The various acts of legislation affecting the currency have aimed to maintain on a parity all the gold and silver coined, or the issues of paper money authorized by Congress.

One means used to accomplish this most desirable end was to make all legal-tender notes, Treasury notes, silver certificates, etc., receivable for customs dues, which latter had previously been payable only in gold coin.

The payment of customs in gold gave the Government all the coin needed for any demands upon it and until 1892 the matter of the gold reserve in the United States Treasury was one attracting no attention whatever, for the principal reason was that we were still dealing with a surplus of revenue.

As the production of silver increased in disproportion to gold the fear of a depreciated standard was carefully cultivated by the creditor nations of Europe, which influence extended to this country, and the claim was set up that the debtor classes at the bidding of the silver producers were intending to have laws enacted to repudiate debts contracted on a gold basis and liquidate them in silver, which was rapidly depreciating in value as compared with gold.

The first great shock to the commercial credit of the world known to the present generation was the failure of the Barings in 1890, in London, growing out of wild speculative ventures in the Argentine Republic. This forced a frightful liquidation in Great Britain and on the Continent, and it happened that the most available securities held abroad were American railroad securities.

Hundreds of millions of bonds and stocks were returned to us, and this necessitated enormous exports of gold.

The only substantial source of supply for gold for export was the United States Treasury. The means of getting it out of the Treasury was the simple presentation of the Government demand notes.

As the world was going crazy with fright at the difficulty of getting and keeping gold, as the banks and banking interests of Europe were exerting themselves to the utmost to accumulate the yellow metal against the possibilities of continued financial distress, as well as looking forward to the sudden bursting of war clouds ever and anon overshadowing the various continental Governments, people in this country began hoarding gold.

Instead of gold being freely used for payment of customs these dues were paid in "greenbacks," United States Treasury notes, and silver certificates about in the order named, until it has come to pass that practically no gold whatever is received into the Treasury through the custom-house.

All other dues to the Government are receivable in any form of currency outstanding, including national-bank notes.

We had not yet recovered from the disastrous effects of the Baring panic of 1890, although we suffered less than Europe, when a greater calamity befell our own people.

The summer of 1892 gave us a Democratic platform which declared there was no constitutional power to enact a tariff except for purposes of revenue only.

Notice was thus given to the great manufacturing and business interests of this country that with the advent of the Democratic party to power the fiscal policy which had been inaugurated at the beginning of this Government was to be utterly overthrown.

To the surprise of all a political cyclone swept the country, caused by the falsehoods of designing men, whereby the laboring classes were for the time persuaded that they were being oppressed and unfairly dealt with, and that a revenue tariff, or practically "free trade," would give them more work, higher wages, and shorter hours.

The seeds of the panic were sown in November, 1892, and the 4th of March, 1893, was anticipated with fear and trembling by all who had capital at stake in the business of the country.

The people were hoodwinked with the claim that the source of all our ills was the so-called Sherman silver law of July 14, 1890, and the extra session of August, 1893, as we all know, was called to repeal it.

Meantime, however, the panic had been precipitated by the intimation from the Treasury Department that Treasury coin notes might be redeemed in silver.

This attracted special and renewed attention to the question and condition of the gold reserve. The demands upon the Treasury were increasing, the discrimination by the holders of currency went on, gold and gold certificates practically disappeared from circulation, and the source of supply of gold to the Treasury from customs was drying up.

Still later the business of the country was paralyzed. Exports decreased and prices declined rapidly. The repeal of the so-called Sherman law did not restore confidence as expected, or bring ship loads of foreign gold to us, as had been so flippantly prophesied by those who desired to distract attention both from the direful effect of threat of tariff revolution and still later from the awful slaughter resulting from the enactment of the Wilson bill itself.

The reduced tariff did not increase but on the contrary brought reduced revenues, for our people had been deprived of a large part of their purchasing power.

No gold flowing into the Treasury, the demands increasing upon the gold reserve for purpose of export, coupled with the deficiency in the revenues of the Government, compelled the reissue of the legal-tender notes used for the purpose of taking gold out; hence the endless-chain process of which we hear so much.

The honor of the nation was at stake; for it is a source of just pride that, as the business world says gold is the highest standard, the United States Treasury has never proffered its creditors anything but gold on a coin contract.

We are thus brought face to face with a grave emergency and the public debt is growing apace. If we were sustaining a war it would be explicable, but thus to turn our backs upon the splendid record of the Republican party in canceling the national debt and still maintaining a full Treasury is a humiliating spectacle not only for our people but for the whole financial world.

We not only need more revenue but we need gold for certain purposes.

We have tried to maintain the gold reserve by selling bonds to replenish it from time to time, and the result is mockery.

We have had three bond issues prior to the one just arranged for, and without some change in the law and in our financial condition these promise to be repeated indefinitely.

House bill No. 1431 seems to meet the essential feature of the situation, viz, by the proposed plan of funding the legal tenders you get rid of the demand for redeeming (?) a note that is never redeemed, but merely exchanged and reexchanged.

The bill proceeds upon the theory that the people will not permit contraction of the currency.

It is proposed to fund the outstanding demand notes into a bond at the pleasure of the note holder, which bond, for the purpose of creating and maintaining elasticity in our currency, shall at the pleasure of the bondholder be reconvertible into the note previously surrendered; but when these notes are thus reissued they will lack the privilege of being redeemed in gold as now, but will only be redeemed or rather exchanged into the proposed bonds thus specially provided. In fact, the 2 per cent interest represents the purchase price paid for the present privilege and mode of redemption.

When money shall be worth less for current use than 2 per cent per annum the noteholder can have his bond, and when money is worth more than 2 per cent per annum the bondholder may exchange his bond for currency. During the period the currency is outstanding the interest accruing on the bonds will inure to the benefit of the Treasury. These notes will continue to possess all the quality of legal tender, and hence will be superior to a national-bank note, but they will no longer be receivable for customs.

A proper addition to this bill, therefore, would be the provision of House bill No. 1453, providing that after a certain date all customs dues shall be paid in gold coin.

With these bills upon the statute books the ever-recurring fear caused by gold exports and the drain upon the Treasury would disappear, to the great benefit of the business community, and the honor of the nation would be without a suspicion.

I do not believe any material portion of the legal-tender notes would be funded under this plan, except in times when, from extraordinary causes, there might be large accumulations of money at certain centers.

The privilege of receiving 2 per cent interest is, in my judgment, ample compensation, and would secure the much-desired end of eliminating the necessity for a gold reserve, and doing it economically and with satisfaction to the business community.

The reason I consider the low rate ample compensation is that these bonds become additionally valuable because their date of maturity will be the most distant, and they will always be worth par in money to the holder and readily exchangeable, which is a consideration of vital importance in periods of money stringency.

In the panics, especially of 1873 and of 1893, large premiums were paid to obtain currency for ordinary purposes, such as wage paying, etc., and the choicest securities were terribly sacrificed by savings banks and other institutions holding deposits subject to call, because of the pressing necessity for actual cash.

The convertible features of the bond proposed by bill No. 1431 would mainly obviate this element of demoralization which always accompanies loss of credit and creates a sudden and greatly enlarged demand for currency.

By these bills you not only make a gold reserve useless, but you release all the money now in the Treasury, leaving it subject to the ordinary demands of the Government.

You continue to the people the use of the larger part of the present noninterest-bearing debt which serves so fully the purposes of a sound currency available in every corner of this land, you restore the flow of gold into the Treasury through the custom-house, and thus furnish gold for all the needs of the Government, and actually cause a freer circulation of gold than now, because the Government would pay out gold to banks and others in the ordinary course of business as currency is now paid out.

Hoarding of gold would cease, as there would be no room for question as to whether the Government would or could maintain the parity.

These bills would meet an emergency without at all interfering with liberal and equitable legislation for the national banks as proposed in House bill No. 1426, nor would it raise any question as to legislating upon the subject of silver.

I would simply meet the demands of an anomalous condition of the currency growing out of a war and the rapidity of developments throughout the world, impossible to have been anticipated thirty years ago.

The silver question is fast adjusting itself by natural processes, for if the production of gold continues to increase as it has during the past six or eight years, tears may be shed over the depreciation of gold instead of silver.

As to the necessity of some such legislation as I have proposed in the bills referred to, gentlemen need only consider the means used to replenish the gold reserve since January, 1894, and the meager net result obtained.

By an official statement of the net gold in the Treasury at various dates from January, 1878, to November, 1895, it will appear by February, 1893, the amount had diminished to the lowest point since January, 1878.

Net gold in the Treasury:
In February, 1893	$103,284,219
In January, 1894	65,650,175
In February, 1894	106,527,068
In July, 1894	54,975,607
In November, 1894	105,424,569
In January, 1895	44,705,967
In June, 1895	107,512,363
On February 8, 1896	44,483,126

The large increases noted for February, 1894, November, 1894, and June, 1895, were the result of bond sales aggregating $162,000,000, thus fixing an annual interest charge for thirty years, and yet on February 8, 1896, the net gold in the Treasury was at the lowest point reached since the resumption of specie payments in 1879. The bond sale just concluded provides again for more than $100,000,000 to be poured into the vacuum caused by the repeated presentation of the same notes at the counter of the subtreasury for exchange into gold; and, as I have already suggested, unless some change is promptly effected in the existing law, no man can anticipate what the condition of the gold reserve will be a year hence or even six months hence. I predict another sale of bonds before this Administration goes out of power.

The magnificent and inspiring spectacle of our people responding to the Treasury calls for $100,000,000 gold by offering nearly $600,000,000 should make us prouder than ever of our American citizenship, of the wonderful natural resources of the land conferred upon us by nature, and of the wisdom of our fathers in leaving us the heritage of such institutions as permit and stimulate our unexampled development and prosperity; and, above all, unite us in such brotherhood that at any call of duty the people rise as one man to tender fortune, honor, or life itself for the common weal.

The example of devotion just presented should, however, not be lost in mere sentimentality, but should cause us to most seriously consider the situation, and honestly, unselfishly, and in the spirit of a true and wise patriotism, propose, discuss, and finally enact such measures into laws as will prevent the necessity of diverting the energies and wealth of the people into the attempted maintenance of the national credit by means which tend to enervation and certain bankruptcy; for if the present methods of permitting deficiencies in the revenues continue, when our citizens are willing to be taxed for all proper purposes, or we continue the suicidal policies of favoring foreign manufacturers at the cost of poverty and ruin to our own people and of allowing the Treasury doors to stand wide open at the same time that we furnish the means for emptying the vaults of the gold with no other source of supply of that commodity than the waste of our substance through an increase of the interest-bearing debt, we shall reach one of two results, either an abnormal national debt without any real consideration, or open and flagrant repudiation.

Such possibilities should excite us to earnest endeavor, lest evil come to our people through our failure of duty and we be justly subjected to scorn for inefficiency or to execration for fiddling while Rome is burning. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the condition which now confronts the House fully justifies the action of the gentlemen on this side who voted against the bill on its passage. It was an admitted fact that the act would never become a law. Whatever its necessity may have been, or whatever emergency called for its enactment, the completed negotiation of the one-hundred-million-dollar loan a few days ago leaves no reason for its further consideration. The dilemma in which we are now placed is whether we shall give our approval to an unnecessary or to a mischievous law.

There being now no occasion, in my judgment, for the bill in its original shape, I suggest that we ought not to stand on ceremony or dignity, but treat the Senate amendment or substitute as an independent bill, originating in that branch of Congress, and sent to us as any other measure. I trust our rules may be so construed as to permit us to do this.

I have only the objection to the third section, providing for compulsory retirement of national-bank notes under the denomination of $10, that it does not go far enough. If silver be a good money metal—and everybody here professes to be its friend—why should it not circulate among the people to the extent of its coinage, or at least to the extent of the demand upon it as a circulating medium? Why should the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to issue certificates against the silver dollars coined from so good a "money metal"? If they constitute such good "standard money," should they be aided by paper currency, whether issued by national banks or by the Government? If silver be inconvenient and burdensome as a circulating medium, is not that the strongest argument against its use as "standard money"? Why should the Government be subjected to the expense of building and strengthening vaults, in which to store the standard silver dollar if it be true, that the people favor its use and are anxious for its unlimited coinage? Money unsuitable or inconvenient for general use certainly ought not to be coined in large or unlimited quantities.

The real truth is, Mr. Speaker, that gold and silver ought to stand each on its own merits. Each has its inconveniences; each has its advantages. Both metals are indestructible; both as compared with other commodities are scarce. Gold is much more valuable, but it suffers greater loss by abrasion in its use as money. Silver is more bulky and less valuable, but its constant use is attended with but little loss. It has that advantage over gold, which, in a large measure, is lost by the action of the Government in issuing gold and silver certificates to circulate instead of specie. Neither the money of these metals—much less the metals themselves—should be stored at the expense of the Government, nor should the burden be cast upon the Government of printing and issuing certificates to circulate in place of either the money or the bullion. When it comes to certificates, gold has an undue advantage over silver, which enhances its comparative value.

If section 3 of the Senate substitute should be amended so as to authorize the taking up and canceling, never to be again issued in any form, all bank bills, gold and silver certificates, and Treasury notes of less denomination than five, or even ten, dollars, and then adopted as amended, we would be doing "something substantial for silver," something practical, nothing visionary or purely theoretical. It would enlarge the use of silver by the amount of bills, certificates, and Treasury notes retired. It would necessarily cause an advance in the price of silver by this increased use. I am constrained to believe that it would cause no disturbance whatever to our financial condition or injuriously affect any business interest.

I am, therefore, willing and hope I may have the opportunity to vote for section 3 of the Senate substitute as a step in the right direction. I would more willingly support it if amended as above suggested.

I am also willing and hope I may be permitted to support by my vote an amendment to section 2, striking out that part which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver certificates against the seigniorage. If we should retire all gold and silver certificates and Treasury notes of small denominations, the vacancy could be safely filled by coining the seigniorage. That would again be "doing something for silver," and I am persuaded that it would not cause its depreciation, nor disturb in the least the business of the country. I am willing to vote for section 2 thus amended.

I am unable, Mr. Speaker, to give the consent of my vote to the first section of this substitute. It opens our mints to the free coinage of the silver of the whole world. We are protectionists on this side of the House, not free traders. Every other commodity of this country which is produced in sufficient quantities to supply our wants should be charged with a duty, and we protectionists believe it should be a reasonably high one. Why let the foreign owner of silver bullion into our market without the payment of any duty, and then why, in addition, should we go to the expense of converting his bullion into coin free of charge? I will not speak of the enhancement in value by this coinage, but it is quite certain that under the provisions of this section, the foreign owner of silver bullion would have an advantage over the United States mine owner, and also have an advantage that the owners of other commodities do not enjoy.

I do not believe that we can at present maintain at a parity with gold, the silver product of the world. I am not willing by my vote to send gold to a premium, or bring about a state of affairs in which the country has two kinds of money of different debt-paying and purchasing power. I am not unaware that it is seriously contended, here and elsewhere, by many of the doctrinaires of free coinage that the parity of the gold and silver coins would not be destroyed. But one of its most eloquent champions on this floor admits that gold would under such circumstances go to a premium. Whether the one or the other be correct, I am unwilling to subject the country at this time to even the risk of going upon a single standard of silver.

It seems to me that at least those on this side of the House should unite in some efforts at legislation that will not only "do something for silver," but for the other interests of the country as well. We all say we are friends of the white metal. We would all like to see its free and unlimited coinage, if we knew the parity with gold would not be destroyed. We all wish to bring about the time when both metals will be treated at our mints with fairness and impartiality.

If we are to bring about this condition, if we expect to reach and maintain genuine bimetallism, we must make careful and sensible preparation for that event. We can not hope that it will come while the balance of trade is so largely against us or while we so largely patronize the "markets of the world," where gold is the only currency, and neglect the "home market," where silver as well as gold is current. We must patronize, and not break down by unfriendly legislation, the American woolgrower. He is willing to sell his product for silver. The Australian, from whom we have so lavishly bought of late, is a "gold bug." It is on a gold basis only that he sells us his wool. We ought to use the raw material of the United States for the manufactured goods that our people need, for the silver dollar will buy both the material and the goods. We ought to employ the workingmen and working women of the United States to manufacture those goods, for with them, the standard silver dollar is current without the intervention of a one, or two, or five, or ten dollar silver certificate.

Our farmers are ready to raise the cotton, and wool, and hides, and provisions to clothe and feed those laborers, and they are not asking better money than silver in payment. Can we expect to use a standard or a kind of money different than that current in the market where we buy our goods? Can we purchase in the "markets of the world" as largely as we have been doing the past year and avoid the use of gold, the only money of these markets? Can we open our market to the competition of gold-standard nations and allow our products to be shut out of their markets? Can we permit them to discriminate against our products, as they are now doing, without a thought of discrimination against them? Shall we allow them to discriminate against our silver and we do nothing in return, except to unanimously invite them to an international silver conference? Shall we adopt British free trade, and not expect to use the monetary system of free trade? If we construct and operate our tariff and revenue system on English ideas, can we expect to do business on any other than the English idea of a single gold standard? Are we to continue to replenish European coffers with gold from our Treasury, with our only source of supply from the sale of thirty-year 4 per cent bonds? Shall we continue to import goods that our own unemployed labor can manufacture? Shall we pay gold to the foreigner for those goods, and also for their carriage to our ports, and collect for our people in silver the smallest item of their cost, the duty? Shall we continually thus discriminate against ourselves and in favor of foreign nations, and then wonder or complain because the balance of trade is against us, or because those nations have demonetized silver? If we are willing to continue our business with them on a gold basis, buy their goods, spend our money in traveling and junketing among them, buy their titles and family names with millionaires' daughters lavishly dowered with United States gold, why should we expect them to join our conferences or remonetize silver?

If true bimetallism comes to this country protection will be its forerunner, not its follower. It will be a genuine protection that serves well our interests and industries—silver as well as all others. It will be attended by discrimination, for that is the best defensive weapon of protection and reciprocity. If discrimination is made in favor of such imported goods as are brought across the ocean in ships built out of United States material, by United States workmen, and manned by United States crews, we may expect again to see our shipyards busy and the United States flag on the ships of our merchant marine. We may also expect to save the $30,000,000 nearly in gold which we are annually paying to foreign shipowners for freight on imported goods. If discrimination is wisely made against the nations who have so harshly discriminated against United States silver, we may confidently expect those nations to be seeking us with invitations to silver monetary conferences—we will not have to hunt them.

I believe that time is coming, but we must first remove "cuckoo" and "mugwump" influences from the administration of our Government. Those influences are for a single gold standard, and for free trade as well. The happy work of their removal will be fully completed on March 4, 1897. Meantime we must keep good not only the credit, but the currency of the nation, and keep every dollar of that currency as good as every other dollar.

And now, Mr. Speaker, with slight apparent but not real inconsistency, the opponents of the original bill on this side of the House ought to vote against concurrence in the Senate substitute or amendment, as that body is pleased to call it. The original bill is quite harmless, if it should now become a law. The horse is gone. It can do no harm to lock the stable door. The amendment or substitute, as it comes from the Senate, is risky and dangerous, and without substantial amendment it ought not to be concurred in by this body. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, the only excuse I shall offer for encumbering the RECORD with any further remarks upon the silver question is that I hope to suggest a few, and a few only, of those points which have not been answered to my comprehension. I said here in the summer of 1893 that I was a bimetallist. I repeat that assertion. I am a bimetallist within my understanding of what a bimetallist is. I confess, however, that I have been somewhat weakened in my opinions as to whether bimetallism in the United States has any existence other than in name, for, having paid due heed to most of the definitions given during the course of this debate, I begin to doubt very seriously whether the person coming within the definitions does or can exist. Gentlemen who say they are bimetallists above and better and more certainly than any others declare that such a being exists only when he is in favor of having two metals of equal value in circulation side by side and at the same time, the one supporting the other. I repeat, I doubt whether the conditions called for by the definitions are possible, and therefore whether there is any such bimetallist.

Now, all the affairs of this life, Mr. Speaker, present conditions and problems not to be solved by academic theories, because nobody ever knows, and I fear none will ever know, just where those theories do and where they do not apply. As I have sat here day after day and heard gentlemen give their refined definitions, always resting upon that condition precedent to their philosophies, "other things being equal," I have been reminded of the opening of an address made many years ago by a disciple of Fowler and Wells. He said:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: Phrenology is an exact science. The proof of that is in the fact that, other things being equal, size is always the measure of strength. But since it never has pleased God Almighty to create two human beings in whom the other things were equal, our science is incapable of demonstration.

[Laughter.]

All the theories and primary propositions on this silver question depend on the old limitation, "other things being equal." It is beyond the comprehension of any man who has yet arisen upon this earth to determine in what cases the "other things are equal," and in what cases they are not; in other words, to measure and define the modifications. So that it always comes back and always will come back to the question of the practical application of any theory or any doctrine.

Now, there is no method or proposition suggesting itself to my mind better calculated to present this question in its nakedness than a supposition that the United States hereafter should mint no coin, but that this Congress should pass a law providing that gold and silver should be henceforth admitted to the mints of the United States for free mintage and on equal terms; that gold should be minted in disks corresponding in size, weight, and fineness to the gold coins now standard, and that silver should be minted into disks of the fineness, weight, size, and form of the present standard silver dollar; that the United States, instead of stamping either one a dollar or five dollars, should simply certify by a stamp on the coin the amount of gold which the one and of silver which the other contained of standard fineness.

Now, consider that proposition adopted, and what would be the effect? Is there a member of this House who does not believe that a disk of the size, weight, and fineness of a ten-dollar gold piece, so stamped, would continue to circulate in this country for $10; that it would be received by every bank on deposit for $10; that it would pay $10 of adverse balance of trade in any nation on the earth? The fact that you demonetized gold to that extent and stamped the disks not as money, but simply to certify to its weight and fineness, would have no possible effect upon its value, except, possibly, to appreciate it somewhat in foreign countries. I do not believe there is any silver man or any other man in this House who will deny that proposition. That being so as to gold, what would be the effect as to silver? The effect would not be to raise its price one particle above the present commercial price. The effect of free and unlimited mintage on equal terms would be neither to lower the gold nor to advance the silver, if neither was a certified money. I do not believe anybody will deny that proposition.

Now, if both those propositions are true, what is the conclusion? Simply this, that the assertion that a standard silver dollar would go as a dollar means to measure the power of the fiat of the Government and make it cover the hiatus between the commercial value of the silver dollar and the 100 cents in real money. Does anybody believe that any piece of metal would circulate in that way on the force of that fiat? And I want to say right here, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that the standard dollars do circulate now as dollars is no answer to that question. I have heretofore called attention to the fact that the Congress of the United States, for the purpose of inspiring confidence in all the money of the United States, put into the statute a declaration that it was the intention of the Government to maintain a parity between gold and silver, and does anybody deny that it was upon the faith of that pledge that silver money has since circulated upon a parity with gold? There was a promise there as absolute in its terms and more solemn in form than that printed on the greenbacks, and no man can say that the present standard silver dollar has ever circulated as a dollar because of the fiat of the Government. Its circulation has rested upon the pledge of the Government to maintain a parity between the two metals just as absolutely as the greenbacks and the silver certificates have rested upon that basis.

I have not been able to understand, either, Mr. Speaker, the force of the arguments of some gentlemen here who give as the only reason for the position they take the necessity for more money. Nobody admits that he stands up here and advocates free coinage for the sole purpose of making a market for the silver product of this country or any other. These gentlemen claim that they want more money; and to demonstrate the necessity for more money they quote the academic authorities to prove that the fall in prices is due to a scarcity of money; and they urge the ancient proposition that, "other things being equal," the price of all the property in a country is influenced by the amount of money of ultimate redemption present in the country.

Since nobody has thought it worth while to attempt to demonstrate here that that proposition can only be true when the value of the money is measured by itself, or the price of the products or commodities is measured by that money, I will. If you assume that there is an independent and unalterable standard, a standard that can neither rise nor fall, not one that is said to rise when goods fall and to fall when goods rise, but an independent, unalterable standard, by which money shall be measured, then, if there is any truth in that proposition, it follows as a necessary deduction that when the price of money shrinks the value of all the property in the country shrinks. Nobody can get away from that, in my judgment; and if it be a sound proposition, it explodes the proposition of Mr. F. A. Walker and other gentlemen of great reputation, on whose propositions the silver arguments in this House are based almost without exception.

But again, looking at the matter in a mere common-sense view, and not resting it upon any refined feelings, the meaning of which you never know until you have spent six weeks in discussing the definition of each term, what would be the effect of free coinage, judged by their own arguments? The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], a gentleman who has made as clear a speech on this subject, in my judgment, as has been made, said distinctly, not once only, but oftener:

> We do not pretend that we are going to bring silver up to the present price of gold, but we are going to pull gold down to meet it.

Who besides him believes that possible in the existing condition of the civilized and commercial nations? Going to drag gold down! Why, sir, their own propositions made in the same speeches refute it. They are going to bring all the silver of the world up by opening the mints of a single country! Are they going to bring all the gold of the world down and leave the mints of every civilized nation open to it? The two propositions side by side exhibit an absurdity. Pull gold down to meet silver, when you do not close a mint on earth to the coinage of gold, and then propose to bring silver up by opening the mints of a single country to it!

Now, I have said the fact that our silver dollars circulate as dollars rests upon the faith in the pledge of the Government to maintain all money on a parity. This is a very great country, beyond question, with resources almost beyond computation, and of its financial stability the world has little doubt. But in heaven's name who would contemplate for a single moment the Government taking upon itself the awful burden of guaranteeing the parity between the gold of the country and all the silver of the world coined into American dollars and put into circulation? I can not believe that anybody would propose that; and yet, strange to say, I am not aware that any mortal so far, in proposing free and unlimited coinage, has proposed to repeal the pledge of the Government to maintain all of its money at a parity. Free coinage without such repeal would bring on an immediate collapse.

Nobody could contemplate for an instant leaving that pledge stand in the face of a free-coinage measure. Nobody can contemplate for an instant, in the light of the arguments made in support of free coinage, that the opening of the mints of a single country is going to bring the silver of the world to a parity with gold. If anybody believes that, he is mistaken in thinking that he believes that it is going to lower the price of gold.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as an abstract academic theory—and gentlemen seem to glory in abstractions—it would make no difference whether we had in a country little money or much money, if we stood by ourselves with all accounts settled. If it were true, as gentlemen assert in the propositions on which their arguments rest, that the amount of money in a country always bears a given relation to all the property of the country, then it would be of small consequence how much money there was in a country, provided all the debts were paid. But it is the debtor in whose welfare these gentlemen are interested. When the Fifty-third Congress opened, for several days the air was rifted with cries of the evil that had been wrought the Government by the lecherous bondholder in that he had received bonds for greenbacks worth 40 cents on the dollar and he had been paid in money worth 100 cents on the dollar.

I call attention to that chiefly to show the accuracy of the statistics which these gentlemen use. The same greenback which was used to buy a bond comes to pay it. The evil of which they complain, the "crime" which is denounced, of the demonetization of silver, happened twenty-three years ago. Now, there is a great deal of talk about the burden and shame, and none call it the crime, of the creditor exacting a different money from what he loaned. Would there be any offense of the same kind in compelling him to take a different kind of money from that which he loaned?

I do not remember that anyone in this discussion has called attention to the fact that it is altogether probable that most of the debts existing at this hour have been created within the twenty-three years, and created since the hour these gentlemen denounce as so fatal, when silver was demonetized, and have been created absolutely on a gold basis by their own theories. Now, what becomes of the argument as applied to the debtor class?

Mr. Speaker, I have already said that the question is not to be settled by fine-spun theories brought from the schools, because neither the professors nor anyone else have ever been, and probably never will be, able to show that their theories apply. It is true to-day in the United States, as it was in France when the wise Napoleon, having examined the theories of the French school, said:

> The political economists of France would grind the Empire to powder.

The money that the United States wants is the money that is good in the marts of the world. If it was only the mere question of getting more money, and if the fiat of the Government was so all powerful as these gentlemen seem to think, the proposition has been made in a simple form of doubling the supply by debasing the present gold coin. The question of money is to be solved in the light of history and the common sense of mankind, wherever that question arises, without regard to arithmetic or the books of philosophy.

You had just as well take a blackboard, a piece of chalk, and printed volume, and set about demonstrating why the squirrel hoards nuts as to undertake to demonstrate why mankind wants money, and why, in a particular epoch in the world's history, he wants some particular kind of money. We can not trace it back to its origin, for the very first transaction we learn of in the history of man was connected with money, and I take it that in the last transaction that shall happen among mankind money will also be there. It is as much a part of us as any other faculty of the human mind, and is as undemonstrable, only when it can be done by mental philosophy and history, as any other faculty in us.

Now, we simply know we stand in a period of time when civilization is higher than we knew of at any other time; when commerce and manufactures, science and art, are in general in advance of what they ever were before, the exchange of commodities throughout and between the nations greater than at any other period of time, and when the great bulk of civilized mankind have determined upon the use of one money and one standard. Here in the United States we have gentlemen who argue that it is not right; that it can not be right. They say that it is not evolution, but conspiracy. No matter as to the questions whether they are right or wrong, the facts are that we are in the position where we can not help ourselves, save by some force which I think we can apply. It is as much beyond our power to break down the value of gold as a money metal among civilized men as it is out of our power to change the orbit of the stars.

The closing of our mints to it would not accomplish that result. Our refusal to use it would not do it, nor is there anything as far as we know or that anybody can suggest that would lower the value of gold one iota anywhere. Inflation increases the price of gold measured in the money of inflation. The only question remaining, then, is to what extent we can raise or lower the value of silver. I do not believe that when we look upon it as a pure question of money, when we divorce the question from a desire to do something for silver as a product, that anybody believes for a moment that it is in the power of a single nation to bring the silver of the world to a gold standard.

By what process can it be done? Can it be done by making it a legal tender? Nobody will take it except those that are compelled to. Will you support it by a pledge given to maintain it on a parity with gold? No. Are there twenty men in this House who will vote for the proposition of free coinage, backed by the pledge of the Government to maintain the silver on a parity with gold? I do not believe there are. If they refuse to do it what will be the reason? A dozen might be given, but the real reason would be a fear that it would impose upon the United States Government financial liabilities greater than it could bear; and can anybody admit that he believes that a pledge of the Government to maintain silver under free coinage at a parity with gold would be a burden upon the Government and then assert that he believes silver would go to maintain a parity?

One gentleman said it might drive gold out, and if it did it would make room for $550,000,000 worth of silver. Well, now, that is all right, Mr. Speaker, in the way of making room for silver; it is all right in the way of finding a place to put silver, but, as a money question, what would be the effect? The effect would be that of exchanging $550,000,000 of gold for $550,000,000 of silver. They want more money. How much more money would they have as a result of retiring $550,000,000 of par money and substituting for it $550,000,000 of money of lesser value? So one after another it seems to me that the propositions the gentlemen make, the grounds they rest upon, and their arguments crumble away. They can not stand together. They demolish each other.

Now, sir, I assert, in conclusion, that I should like to see bimetallism. I believe I said that once before. I should like to see the kind of bimetallism which gentlemen define—the bimetallism of the bimetallist's dream. It might be maintained, Mr. Speaker, and I am not prepared to assert that it could not be, if we start in making a silver dollar big enough to be worth a dollar, and then lighten it as we find its value increasing by being monetized, if it increase at all. No free-silver man would consent to that. I should like to see gold and silver circulating side by side interdependent upon and supporting each other, as somebody has said, and as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY] has said, yoked together. But they never have traveled together in that yoke, except for short periods of time, when their commercial values kept together, and I am afraid they never will. If the United States desires bimetallism, if it will address itself to the task of bringing it about among the civilized nations of the world, I believe we can accomplish something in that way, but to talk about doing it alone and in the face of all the nations is to my limited comprehension perhaps the most egregious folly that I have ever heard propounded in statesmanship.

We can not lower the value of gold. How could we bring up the value of silver? We can do nothing toward equalizing these moneys beyond our own border, and if to-day, in the close-knit way in which the nations live, we can not do anything toward equalizing it beyond our own border, save by a pledge of the Government to maintain the parity, how much can we do within our own borders? I have heard nothing advanced except the gentlemen's statements that it is in the power of the Government to make silver a legal tender for the payment of debts. Now, that may be true to a limited extent only. There is no doubt that very many contracts, and just those contracts that excite the ire of these gentlemen most, are made payable in gold coin of present standard of weight and fineness.

Can the Congress of the United States impair the obligation of those contracts? Suppose, again, there is no expression as to the kind of money, and no interpretation can be extracted from the agreement as to the kind of money to be paid at a given time. What the courts would say about it when confronted with a tender of debased coin no man knows. So I think, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with great regret—that day after day we are here hearing that which they want and not that which is attainable. They want a very desirable thing. Day after day they are giving the groundwork of the theory of their desires, unstable, inconsistent, contradictory. Day after day it seems to me that statistics are being filed which demonstrate, if anything can be demonstrated in this world, that the thing which we desire is at this time beyond attainment by their methods. There is only one method to attain it. If I may not use the word "force," then I say by the method of pressure. Do it by discrimination, do it by any advantage within your power that you may exercise diplomatically and safely, but to do it by the mere method of proceeding to coin silver free and unlimited is a mathematical fallacy.

Behind all that, the question whether the progress of the world, the evolution of society, commerce and trade, banking facilities, and the increase in gold will continue to leave within the veins of trade the necessity for coining other metal, is a question which must be decided, in my judgment, by circumstances; for the propositions of these gentlemen themselves as to the relative values of money seem to demonstrate that there is no difference, after balances are once settled, whether there is some more money or some less. They seem to demonstrate that it is desirable that the nations of the world dealing with each other shall, if possible, have one standard. They seem to demonstrate that it ought not to be possible for anyone to disturb at will that standard and the relation of money to commerce or of money to prices.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is all I care to say, except to call attention to the climax in the argument of the learned gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] when he declared as the necessary conclusion of his preceding propositions that "the Mexican dollar is worth as much as it ever was, but the United States dollar is worth twice as much." The gentleman is generally very accurate. If he is right now, the United States laborer who is paid in the United States dollars gets double in his dollar what he would get if our dollar had remained on a parity with the Mexican dollar.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, while I am of the opinion that nothing that has been said, nothing I may say, and nothing that will be said during this debate will influence the final fate of this bill as it is now worded, I will take advantage of the opportunity offered me to briefly state a few of the reasons that compel me to oppose it and to finally vote in favor of nonconcurrence in the Senate substittute.

In the first place I was in favor of and voted for the original bond bill sent by this House to the Senate, which the Senate repudiates by this substitute, and I will not give the action of the Senate the approval of my vote in fovor of the bill as it is returned to us.

As I understand the bill as now returned to this House, it provides for the free and unlimited coinage of all silver that may be presented to the mints of the United States into coins to be called dollars; that such so-called dollars shall be paid and accepted in satisfaction of all obligations, public and private, and be, under the laws of the United States, of the same value and purchasing and paying power as the gold coins now recognized and honored throughout the world as dollars, regardless of the actual value in gold of the silver of which they are made.

In other words, while all the remainder of the civilized world treats silver merely as a metal of fluctuating commercial value, this substitute proposes to fix and maintain its value in this country at one-sixteenth that of gold and open a free and unrestricted market in this country where all the world may exchange its silver for our gold, or gold's worth, when it is conceded by all that 1 ounce of gold, or what 1 ounce of gold will purchase, is worth at least 32 ounces of silver. With this fact admitted and before us, how can anyone claim that by an act of Congress their relative values can be changed and their parity at the ratio of 16 to 1 be established or maintained? It would be as sensible to attempt to change night into day by legislative enactment. The ounce of gold would purchase 32 ounces of silver bullion, and the 32 ounces of silver bullion when coined into so-called silver dollars would purchase only 1 ounce of gold, or what 1 ounce of gold would buy. Sixteen ounces of the coined silver would not do it. We may give the word "dollar," when applied to silver, a new meaning, but we can not give to the silver dollar by this substitute a value it in fact will not commercially possess.

If this bill should become law there can not be any question that the market for silver it would make would be abundantly supplied, at least until our gold would be exhausted and, as currency, forever depart from our sight, and until the commodities we have heretofore sold for gold, or its representative, advanced, nominally, to at least double their present price. Every ship approaching our shores would be laden with the silver our friends from the silver-producing States and Territories want us to "help," and they would leave us loaded with our gold and products purchased at half their value until our people learned that an enactment could not make a "parity," and that here, as in other parts of the world, gold was the standard and measure of values, and by that standard and measure they must fix their prices.

That it would advance the actual value of anything I deny, but that it would lessen the value of everything we have to realize on, land, labor, materials, manufactured articles, grain, credits, and securities, at least one-half, until the actual value of the so-called silver dollar should be generally understood, I affirm, and the laborers, farmers, producers, investors, creditors, and depositors would suffer the loss, and the capitalists, bankers, insurance companies, and speculators would realize the profit.

Labor, land, grain, and merchandise move last and slowest in response to the change in value of the currency for which they are sold, and labor the last and slowest of all. Every advance, although only nominal, in the wages of laborers is contested with dogged determination by the employers, and rarely obtained without organized and persistent effort. If this bill should become a law and the medium with which the laborer is paid is only worth one-half that he has been receiving, it will be a long time before the wages he receives will be increased in a corresponding degree. He will still be receiving from one to three dollars in name for his work, but in name only, and his expenses must be met by the actual value of the silver with which they are paid.

The laborer, as a rule, is without credit and deals on a cash basis, and confines his operations to the present. He has only his own money and muscle to invest, and on them, and them alone, he must depend for subsistence, with rarely a hope of anything more.

The capitalist operates on credit and deals with an eye to the future value of what he purchases and of the currency in which he will be required to pay. His credit to a great extent is his capital, and with that he makes his greatest profit. The banker uses the deposits of his customers and the insurance companies the premiums paid by their insured with which to earn interest, and the dealer in real estate often makes no more of a cash payment than is necessary to cover any probable shrinkage in the property he buys, and the cheaper each can get the currency with which to satisfy his obligation the more money he will make and the more the depositor, insured, and real-estate seller will lose. It is not the poor man that is the debtor, but the rich man, whose credit enables him to obtain the money of other men to use for his own benefit.

If it were known that this bill would become law, as it is known it will not, transactions would now be under way that would make greater profits and fortunes for men already rich and having credit with which to deal than have been made by any fluctuations during this or any other century, but the laboring man and man of small means would not share in any of them.

Purchases would be made and obligations assumed on the basis of prices now measured by the dollar of gold, in a short time to be paid and satisfied in the 50-cent dollar of silver, and the purchaser would only have to wait until prices adjusted themselves to the new value of the American dollar in order to obtain for the article purchased double what he paid for it, although its actual value had all the time remained stationary.

No more injurious law to the working class in whatever avocation engaged could be passed by this Congress.

Every surviving soldier, every widow and orphan of our soldier dead, receiving a pension is an honored creditor of the United States of America and its people, and if this substitute should become a law the purchasing power of the pension would be only one-half what it now is. In other words, every pension would be reduced 50 per cent, and the Government would not save one cent by its unfair action.

It is claimed by those favoring the substitute that it should be passed in order that the silver coined under it may become a part of our circulating medium, and in that way relieve us from the present money stringency, but the substitute substantially contradicts that assumption, as it provides that—

Whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

It does not contemplate the use of the coined silver as a circulating medium, but it does contemplate having the Government coin, store, and be responsible for it without compensation, and issue silver certificates on it to be used as currency. Not one of these advocates of this bill would do the same thing for the best friend he may have.

I fear the advocacy of this substitute is fathered by a somewhat selfish motive in the interest of those who have silver to sell or debts, contracted under the law as it has so long existed, to pay.

The gentlemen from the silver-producing part of our country may be pardoned for wanting the United States to declare that a certain amount in weight of their principal product shall be received and accepted as a dollar, and with equal propriety I might be justified in demanding that certain quantities of corn, wheat, and oats raised in the great agricultural district I have the honor to represent should be of the same value.

I am in favor of the use of American silver stamped in an American mint to the extent that the people may consider necessary or convenient, but I want every silver dollar as good as a greenback dollar now is, and that is as good as gold in every country in the world where commercial currency is used.

I will be glad if through the instrumentality of an international congress silver is made money at a fixed and permanent value, but I am not now in favor of attempting to give silver a fictitious value in this country alone for the benefit of all the other nations. I am not in favor of making this country a dumping ground for all the silver of the world, and I am not in favor of forever saying good-bye to gold.

We are too rich and great a people to Mexicanize ourselves at this late day, and our credit has been too good since the close of our great civil war to ruin it by semirepudiation now.

We know by experience that we have only to touch with our promise any circulating medium we desire to use as money to make it as good as gold, and do not let us cripple the faith the world has in us.

There is no trouble with our currency or the amount of it. It has been good in sunshine and shadow, and we had better let it alone. We have never known, and will never know, a better. We have more of it than we will use, and it will not be coaxed out of its hiding until there is a change in the administration of our Government. With an Administration that can not in a time of profound peace make the Government self-sustaining, but is constantly spending more than it earns, it is not strange that capital does not seek investment except in Government bonds it knows the Republican party will be in power to pay. The trouble is not with the currency, but with the un-American policy of this Administration and the laws enacted by a Democratic Congress and approved by a Democratic Executive.

We will not have to wait much longer. After the 4th day of next March the party that was troubled only with its surplus in the Treasury will be again in power, and then all this talk of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and the endless chain that is constantly depleting the Treasury will be remembered as legends of the dark ages.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize any gentleman who wishes to discuss this question. [After a pause.] If no gentleman wishes to discuss the question, and if there be no objection, the House will now take a recess until to-morrow morning at half past 10.

Accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until Thursday, February 13, 1896, at 10.30 a. m.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CATTLE QUARANTINE LINES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, in response to a resolution of the 12th instant calling for information as to whether any change has been made recently by order of the Agricultural Department in the quarantine lines heretofore established with regard to the transportation north of cattle from Texas and other Southwestern States or Territories, etc., transmitting copies of the regulations establishing the quarantine line in the Southwestern States for the years 1895 and 1896; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CIVIL SERVICE CORRESPONDENCE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Civil Service Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 29, 1896, the correspondence respecting the enforcement of the civil-service law between the Public Printer and the Civil Service Commission between the dates of July 1, 1895, and November 1, 1895, with a detailed statement of all matters pertaining thereto, together with the correspondence between certain discharged employees of the Government Printing Office and the Civil Service Commission between July 1, 1895, and November 1, 1895; which, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Pa., to the President and Congress of the United States on the attitude of Congress relative to the Monroe doctrine; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Winnebago County Association of Union ex-Prisoners of War, of Rockford, Ill., praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the late war who were confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens and members of the Board of Trade of Cairo, Ill., praying for the continuance of the Mississippi River Commission in charge of the improvement of that river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a petition of the members of the faculty of the New Hampshire College of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts, in favor of the passage of the bill to organize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy, to increase the usefulness and numbers of the corps of naval engineers, to induce the scientific institutions to provide the naval engineering reserve for time of war, etc. The petition is signed by C. H. Pettee, dean and professor of mathematics; F. William Rane, professor of agriculture: C. H. Kinne, instructor in modern languages; H. C. Hodges, jr., instructor in military science; A. F. Nesbit, instructor in physical science; Charles L. Parsons, professor of chemistry; Albert Kingsbury, professor of mechanical engineering; C. W. Scott, professor of history and political economy; Fred. W. Morse, chemist, experiment station; H. H. Lamson, bacteriologist experiment station; C. M. Weed, professor of biology, and Charles S. Murkland, president and professor of English.

In presenting this petition I will venture to suggest that a casual examination of this matter leads me to the conviction that the passage of this bill will do two things: That it will encourage the technological schools of the country to give the highest possible training to these young men, thus fitting them to go out from these colleges well prepared for any position to which they may be called, and that it will open an avenue for these men to enter the Navy and to aid in materially increasing its efficiency. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Samuel Morris, president of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for protection to Christians of the United States in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a joint resolution of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, urging Government protection to the Christians in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution No. 19. Asking Government protection for Christians in Armenia.

Whereas the Christian people of Americh and the civilized world have been shocked by the intelligence of the outrages inflicted and the brutal murders committed by the Moslem savages in Armenia since the commencement of the last massacres in September, 1894, since which time, it is said, as many as 75,000 persons, men, women, and children have been put to death for no other or better reason than because of their devotion to the Christian religion: Therefore

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That we earnestly petition our Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the adoption of such measures as will show to all the world our abhorrence of such atrocities as have been committed in Armenia, and extend to them such protection and material aid as is within the power of this Government and as will protect, in that and other fields, our missionaries from violence, outrage, and indignity, and will enable them to pursue their work of faith, labor, and love in the interest of a brighter and better civilization.

Be it further resolved, That the governor of the State of Ohio cause to be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress duly certified copies of the above resolution.

DAVID L. SLEEPER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 7, 1896.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Ohio:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Samuel M. Taylor, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is an exemplified copy, carefully compared by me with the original rolls now on file in this office and in my official custody as secretary of state, as required by the laws of the State of Ohio, of a joint resolution adopted by the general assembly of the State of Ohio on the 7th day of February, A. D. 1896.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, this 7th day of February, A. D. 1896.

SAMUEL M. TAYLOR,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Wellington, Ohio, and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ripley, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ravenna, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. ALLEN presented a memorial of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Pa., to the President and Congress of the United States on the attitude of Congress relative to the Monroe doctrine; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented certain papers to accompany the bill (S. 2070) to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Miles F. Durkee, heretofore introduced by him; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY presented the petition of James S. Crawford, of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation for his relief; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BATE presented the petition of D. A. Nunn, of Brownsville, Tenn.; the petition of Rev. J. H. Witt, of McKenzie, Tenn.; and a petition of sundry citizens of Nashville, Tenn., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a series of resolutions adopted at the twenty-sixth annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, held at Washington, D. C., January 28, 29, and 30, 1896, in favor of the uniform classification of freight. I do not know whether the resolutions are exactly in the proper form, but I present them for the purpose of having them printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a preamble and resolutions of the Cotton Exchange of Memphis, Tenn., a commercial body of ability and enterprise, urging certain specific improvements in the navigation of the Mississippi River. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Wilmington, N. C., praying Congress for the passage of Senate bill No. 1159, introduced by Mr. SQUIRE, for the purpose of appropriating money to be used for the construction of coast defenses. The petition represents that the great commercial interests centering in our seacoast cities and our present defenseless condition require the speedy passage of the above-mentioned bill. The meeting, it is stated, was a large one, comprising nearly all the business men of Wilmington, lawyers, physicians, etc., and states that the petition can be taken as the unanimous sentiment of the people of Wilmington. It is signed by business men of the city of Wilmington and by the mayor. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE presented a petition of sundry business men of the State of Washington, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1242 to improve the merchant-marine engineer service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 988, to remove contests and litigations in the United States Land Department from that Department to the courts of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of McMurray, Wash., remonstrating against the appropriation of public moneys for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented certain papers to accompany the bill (S. 2084) for the relief of C. A. Bjornstad, heretofore introduced by him; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TURPIE presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Christian Church of Marion, Ind., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, to prohibit the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. TURPIE. I present a paper as evidence in the contested seat of Mr. Du Pont, of the State of Delaware. It is a certified copy of the return of the election of William T. Watson as Senator for the county of Kent in the general assembly of the State of Delaware. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper will be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 67) authorizing the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 597) for the relief of Samuel S. Boyer, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1448) to withdraw from the Supreme Court jurisdiction of criminal cases not capital, and confer the same on the circuit courts of appeals, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 119) for the relief of William Stanley, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 485) for the relief of Thomas J. Spencer, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 593) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend chapter 67, volume 23, of the Statutes at Large of the United States," placing enlisted men on the retired list after they shall have served thirty years in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 186) to encourage American shipping, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 189) to encourage American shipping, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1699) for the relief of William Loring Spencer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1945) granting a pension to Joseph Porter, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 490) to indemnify the State of Pennsylvania for money expended in 1864 for militia called into the military service by the governor under the proclamation of the President of June 15, 1863, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DUBOIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 191) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1075) for the relief of the heirs of D. Fulford, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 608) to amend the military record of John A. Miller, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 251) for the relief of Peter D. Staats, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 621) for the relief of the legal representative of George McDougall, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1205) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2014) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Bull, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] on the 21st ultimo, to report it with a substitute. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Public Printer be, and hereby is, directed to eliminate from 10,000 copies of the Report on the Statistics of Agriculture in the United States, Census of 1890, the monograph entitled "Report on agriculture by irrigation in the western part of the United States;" that he be authorized to print an appendix, the data for which shall be furnished by the Interior Department, bringing the water-supply information up to date, and an index; and that he bind the monograph thus enlarged in one volume in style uniform with the other final Census reports; that of this report on irrigation 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,500 copies shall be for the use of the House, and 1,500 copies for distribution by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the volume embraces the publication on the subject of irrigation recently prepared by Professor Newell?

Mr. HALE. It takes that report out of the big volume of the Census, and publishes it by itself, eliminating it from the large volume.

Mr. ALLEN. Professor Newell has recently prepared a small monograph on the subject of irrigation and water supply. Does this embrace the publication of that monograph?

Mr. HALE. That I do not know. It is that part of the volume issued by the Census Bureau relating to irrigation, and covers the subject very fully. I will state that upon the suggestion of Western Senators, who are interested in this matter, it seemed to the committee a very proper course, instead of suffocating it in a big volume which nobody will read, to put it into a shape in which it can be distributed.

Mr. PEFFER. The resolution proposes to bring the work down to the present time, I understand the Senator from Maine to say?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported as a substitute by the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEEP WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE] December 30, 1895, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute; and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That there be printed at the Government Printing Office at the earliest day practicable, from electrotype plates to be furnished to the Public Printer by the within-named association wholly without cost to the Government, 3,000 copies, in separate form, of the Proceedings of the First Annual Convention of the International Deep Waterways Association, for circulation, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the reports in these two cases be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reports will be printed under the rule.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 65) to print the annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That section 89, second proviso, of the act of January 12, 1895, an act providing for the public printing and binding, etc., be, and is hereby, amended, by inserting after the words "tide tables, coast pilots," the words, "annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN. I present a report upon the joint resolution, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 2091) removing the charge of desertion from the name of Edward Hughes, who served as a private in Company C, Fifth United States Volunteers, and also as a private in Company D, Thirty-eighth United States Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 2102) for relief of the trustees of the First Baptist Church of Suffolk, Nansemond County, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2103) for the relief of Josiah Booker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 2104) making Jackson's birthday a legal holiday; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2105) to extend the privileges of the act of January 5, 1893, to certain persons specified and described; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2106) granting a pension to William H. Lane; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2107) to grant land to the State of Alabama for the use of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2108) to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 2109) for the relief of Joel S. Shropshire, of Butte City, Mont.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2110) granting an increase of pension to Joseph S. Dixon, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2111) increasing the pension of Fletcher S. Kidd; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH introduced a bill (S. 2112) to extend the provisions of section 4631, Title LIV, "Prize," of the Revised Statutes, and of the act of June 8, 1874, in relation to prize money, to fleet officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2113) to repeal sections 4532, 4533, and 4534, and to amend sections 4516 and 4529 of the Revised Statutes, all relating to the employment, treatment, and payment of seamen on merchant vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR BARRACKS AND QUARTERS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reexamine Treasury settlements Nos. 9672, 9686, 9667, 9668, 9671, 9673, 9676, 9677, 9683, 9688, 9690, 9678, 9687, 9679, 9693, 9697, 168, 9659, 9684, 9685, 9674, 9675, 9691, 9661, 9689, 9692, 9694, 9670, and 9680, being claims for barracks and quarters, certified to Congress for appropriation in House Executive Document No. 234, Fifty-third Congress, third session, for the payment of which no appropriations have been made, and if found correct to report the same to Congress at as early a day as practicable at the present session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President of the United States to return to the House the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory," for the correction of a verbal error; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ASSISTANT DOORKEEPERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which will be read.

Mr. DANIEL. Before the resolution is read, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state, if the Senator will permit me, that the birthday of Washington is approaching, and I have been urged by the ladies who are incorporated by the bill——

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all to the measure, but as this is a privileged question, I think it ought to be acted on. It is the resolution concerning two of the employees of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Virginia later. The resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Alonzo H. Stewart, of Iowa, be, and he is hereby, chosen assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to amend the resolution by adding at the end:

And that Bernard W. Layton, of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen acting assistant doorkeeper of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. DANIEL. I will state that the bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution has passed the other House. It has been examined by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, and is recommended with two immaterial amendments. It is very desirable that it shall be put upon its passage, as the Daughters of the American Revolution wish to be incorporated before the 22d day of February, when they will have a meeting here.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 3, line 4, after the word "Maryland," to insert:

Mrs. Francis P. Burrows (Mrs. Julius C. Burrows), Mrs. Mary H. McMillan (Mrs. James McMillan), Mrs. Emma Gregory Hull (Mrs. J. A. T. Hull), Mrs. Mary B. K. Washington (Mrs. Joseph Washington).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 14, after the word "Congress," to strike out "said reports or such portions thereof as he may see fit" and insert "such portion thereof as he may deem of national interest and importance"; so as to make the first clause of section 3 read:

That said society shall report annually to the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution concerning its proceedings, and said secretary shall communicate to Congress such portion thereof as he may deem of national interest and importance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to make a short statement as a matter of personal privilege.

I have been somewhat annoyed by a great many requests made to me and statements to the effect that I have been in some way connected with the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] in relation to the proposed investigation in the Post-Office Department, and some reflections upon the Postmaster-General, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Neilson. For the purpose of avoiding further inquiry upon the subject, I desire to state that I have no kind of connection and never have had with the resolution nor with moving the investigation. I have a high opinion of the Postmaster-General, of his ability and efficiency, and that of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

I did introduce, at the request of some of the employees and citizens of the District, a bill to increase the compensation and put upon the regular roll of the Department the employees in the mail bag repair division. I think their compensation ought to be increased, and I shall advocate it. I am in favor of a reasonable and sufficient compensation for all employees of the United States. Further than this, I have had no connection with the matter.

ALLEGED ASSESSMENTS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. PEFFER. There are two resolutions lying on the table, one relating to an inquiry into the Post-Office Department, which I should like to have laid before the Senate, and the other, for the appointment of a special committee, I should like to have go over and retain its place, to be laid before the Senate to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER February 12, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether, during the year 1895 or any portion thereof, any of the employees of the Post-Office Department, while receiving pay from appropriations for that Department, did, with the knowledge, connivance, or direction of any clerk or clerks, or chief or chiefs of division, levy and collect assessments of money on and from other employees of the Department to be used, and which was used, for political purposes in States where election campaigns were in progress at that time; whether any person or persons were employed and borne on the Department rolls as employees and regularly paid as such who, while pretending to be discharging the duties of inspectors in the free-delivery service, were in fact actively engaged in aiding and assisting one of the political parties in said election campaign; whether, during such time, in room 3 of the Interior Department building, or in any other room or rooms in said building or in any other building, any employee of the Department was directing or managing the employment of persons for the purposes aforesaid and receiving and disbursing the moneys so assessed and collected, and whether such manager or director kept an account of such moneys in his own name in any bank of the city of Washington or elsewhere.

The committee will inquire and report, further, whether during the period covered by this resolution any person or persons were employed by any clerk or chief of division in the Post-Office Department and kept on the Department pay rolls and paid out of the Department funds, which payment was not authorized by law or by any lawful rule or regulation of the Department, and for which services no appropriation had been made by Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand the Senator from Kansas does not ask to have the resolution considered this morning, but that it may go over without prejudice.

Mr. PEFFER. I am perfectly willing that it may go over without prejudice.

Mr. HALE. Let it be printed.

Mr. PEFFER and Mr. PLATT. It is already printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over, retaining its place.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution, by Mr. PEFFER, providing for the appointment of a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that that resolution go over without prejudice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a series of resolutions submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions submitted by Mr. ALLEN February 12, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate full information on the following subjects:

First. The number of miles of the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company as originally constructed and as it now exists, the estimated actual cost per mile of the construction thereof, its then and present capitalization, and any change that may have been made in its capitalization, and whether, and if so, when, and to what extent, its capitalization was changed or increased, and whether such change or increase was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States, the names and residences, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively.

Second. The number of miles of the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the estimated actual cost per mile of its construction, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so, when and how often, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and whether such change or increase, if any, was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States; also the names and addresses, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, giving the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively.

Third. The number of miles of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company as originally and at present constructed, the estimated actual cost per mile of the construction thereof, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so when and to what extent, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and if such change or increase, if any, has been, and whether it is, authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States; the names and residences, respectively, of the stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees thereof, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively, and whether such railroad was constructed on the line contemplated by the act authorizing its construction, and if not, whether its present line was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States.

Fourth. The number of miles of the main line of the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company as originally and now constructed, the estimated actual cost per mile of its construction, its original and present capitalization, and whether, and if so to what extent, its capitalization has been changed or increased, and whether such change or increase was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States; the names and residences, respectively, of its stockholders, bondholders, and mortgagees, and the amount of such stocks, bonds, and mortgages held by them, respectively, and whether said railroad was constructed on the line and from and to the points contemplated by the act authorizing its construction, and if not, whether its construction on its present line was authorized or sanctioned by the Government of the United States.

Fifth. The names under which the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, and the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company were severally constructed, and whether any changes in the names thereof have taken place since their construction, and if so, what names have been given to said respective roads and the names now in use by them, giving specifically all the changes in names and the consolidations, if any, that have taken place from the time of their construction, respectively, to the present moment, to the end that the Senate may be fully informed as to the several names under which these several railroads have been and are now being operated, and have exact information as to the consolidations and changes therein that may have taken place.

Sixth. What branches, if any, have been constructed or purchased by said respective railroads and added as feeders or otherwise to their respective main lines, giving the names of all of such railroads that may have been thus constructed or purchased by any of them, the cost of such construction or purchase, and the source from which the funds to construct or purchase the same were derived, and whether, and if so, what, sums of money were derived from the main lines of said railroads and used in the construction or purchase of any such additional railroads or feeders.

Seventh. The total amount of subsidy bonds issued in aid of the construction of said respective main lines, the total number of acres of land donated to each of them by the United States, and whether all of said lands have been selected and taken by them or not, or if any other corporation or company of persons has been formed for the purpose of handling or disposing of said lands, and if so, the names of said corporations or companies, the manner in which the lands have been disposed of by them, if any, and their present condition.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope that resolution will be acted upon at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On yesterday I had some comments or criticisms of a friendly character to make respecting these resolutions. While I have no desire to interpose the slightest objection to the furnishing through proper channels of any information that will be of service to the Senator from Nebraska, or of service to the Senate, much of the information called for, as I explained yesterday, it seems to me is extraneous, and many of the facts are not within the knowledge, and can not be in the possession, of the Secretary of the Interior. I fear the resolutions, even so far as the information called for may be in possession of the Secretary of the Interior, are such that their purpose may be defeated by reason of the time it will take to procure the information. I have prepared an amendment which I shall offer, and which I trust the Senator from Nebraska will accept. I shall content myself with that. I think it will still save all he desires.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "subjects," the twenty-second word in the resolutions, it is proposed to insert:

So far as said information is on file in the Department of the Interior or in the possession of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Secretary of the Interior has appeared before the Committee on Pacific Railroads in another body on this very subject of the Union Pacific Railroad, in which he advocated that certain action be taken. I apprehend that what the Senator desires are facts, and this amendment to the resolutions will limit the Secretary in what he is to furnish to such of the facts as are in his Department or in his possession, and I take it that is all the Senator from Nebraska desires. If he desires information in the possession of any other officials, I shall be very glad to join him in a resolution which will direct them to divulge to the Senate such information as they have. I trust the amendment will not be objected to.

Mr. ALLEN. I regret very much that the Senator from Colorado should undertake to disembowel the resolutions by his amendment. The Secretary of the Interior no doubt has much valuable information in his possession with reference to the land grants to these various railroads, the amount of land that has been taken up under the grants, and their disposition.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I do not interrupt the Senator, that all comes in under the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt there is much valuable information on the subject in the offices of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Railroads that can be compiled and sent to the Senate with reasonable speed, which will be valuable to the Senate in the determination of the disposition to be made of these railroads and the Government liens.

I beg to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that if the resolutions call for information which is not in the possession of the Secretary of the Interior, he can inform us of that fact in his answer to the resolutions quite as well as we can anticipate that he does not possess the information.

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is simply to rob these resolutions of their force, and by that means prevent the Senate from having the information that we are justly entitled to, and which we need before we can intelligently act upon legislation that may be brought before us. The Senator from Colorado suggests that much of this information is open to us. It may be. I do not know where it is, however.

Mr. BRICE. If the Senator from Nebraska will yield to me for a moment, I will inform him that the Committee on Pacific Railroads made a partial report at the last session of Congress, embodying almost all the information asked for in these interrogatories, and their report is a printed document of the Senate. In listening to the reading of the resolutions, I think I may say that nine-tenths of the questions asked are answered in that report formerly made, and are now in print. As to the remainder, the other tenth, or whatever percentage it may be, neither the Interior Department nor any other Department of the Government is in possession of the information.

Mr. ALLEN. What part is that?

Mr. BRICE. Anything which is not contained in the report of the Committee on Pacific Railroads is not in the possession of any officer of the Government, because that report was made after about eighteen months of examination and conference between the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and various members of the Committee on Pacific Railroads. If the information desired is to be obtained, it can be done, in my judgment, much more expeditiously and with much more certainty if the Senator from Nebraska will amend his resolutions so as to direct the Committee on Pacific Railroads to make a report, as the resolutions involve subjects not contained in their former report, with power to send for persons and papers and to take testimony in order to inform themselves on those points. In that way the information which the Senator desires can be obtained.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think I shall take advantage of the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, if the resolutions can pass without any opposition, and ask that the resolutions may be directed to the Committee on Pacific Railroads and amended by striking out "the Secretary of the Interior" and inserting: "That the Committee on Pacific Railroads be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate," etc.

Mr. BRICE. And add "with power to send for persons and papers and to take testimony"; otherwise the information desired by the Senator can not be obtained.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if he allow the resolutions to pass, as the Senator from Nebraska now proposes, and the Committee on Pacific Railroads find that they require authority to send for persons and papers to get any part of the information, they will report undoubtedly what they possess, and ask for authority to send for persons and papers if necessary. It is not necessary to embarrass the resolutions now by putting that authority in, for of course the resolutions would then have to go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will comply with the request of the Senator from Massachusetts and not press the amendment.

Mr. BRICE. I do not insist upon it at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is impossible to understand the private arrangement being made by Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. ALLEN. I will say, for the benefit of the Senator from Rhode Island, that if he will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD issued to-day, page 1638, he will find the resolutions which I offered printed.

I now propose this modification to my resolution:

That the Committee on Pacific Railroads be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with full information on the following subjects—and let the remainder of the resolutions stand as they are.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That will do.

Mr. ALDRICH. That will, of course, be done without any expense to the Government?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know whether that can be done without expense to the Government or not. After looking over the construction of the Committee on Pacific Railroads I have faith to believe that those resolutions will be examined in good faith, and that with due and convenient speed the committee will report the information; or, if there is any portion of it which they can not obtain, they will act in good faith and ask power of the Senate to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg to assure the Senator from Nebraska, in the absence of the chairman of the committee—and I know I am authorized to express his views, and I think I know the sentiment of the committee generally—that the committee are extremely anxious to furnish to the Senate and to the Senator from Nebraska all the information he asks for so far as it is obtainable, and if it shall so be that such testimony can not be obtained without sending for persons and papers, I have no question but that the committee will so report and ask the judgment of the Senate upon that.

Mr. ALLEN. Indulge me in one more word. I have noticed by the press from time to time that the Committee on Pacific Railroads has had certain witnesses before them for examination, and I hope the committee will not construe my words as any reflection upon them when I say that I have failed to observe that any of the patrons of the road have been brought before the committee and examined. Their examinations thus far seem to have been confined to stockholders and bondholders of the road, and their agents and attorneys, who come here for the purpose of being heard.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will kindly outline to the Senate what particular light a patron of the road could, because he is a patron of the road, furnish to the committee in the line of a proper bill for the reorganization of the properties?

Of course the committee is extremely desirous of obtaining all possible information, and up to this time the committee has heard everybody who has appeared. There have been delegations of citizens opposed to any pending plan. We have heard them patiently and considerately, and have had postponed meetings in order that others might be heard. Everybody who has presented himself has been heard, but of course we can not send for the patrons of the roads; we can not advertise for them, as they are not known by name; but if the Senator can suggest any particular patrons of the road who have valuable information in their possession—I speak in the absence of the chairman—I have no doubt the committee will send for them and give them an opportunity to be heard. Anything valuable in the line of reorganization that can be procured by sending for patrons of the road I have no doubt the committee would be swift to adopt.

Mr. ALLEN. In reply to the Senator from Colorado, I think I can shed some light on this matter. I fail to observe that the boards of trade, the associations of wholesale merchants, or the grain dealers or stock dealers along those lines of road have been invited to appear before the committee and give their views on reorganization. I have not the slightest doubt that persons in the cities of Omaha, Cheyenne, Denver, and other places where the Union Pacific Railroad runs and where the Kansas Pacific Railroad runs would be able to furnish valuable information to the committee. In fact, I think I know that they possess information that would be of great value to the committee, and which would shed much light upon this very dark problem. I beg to express the hope that the committee will now turn its attention from bondholders and stockholders and mortgagees and stockbrokers and attorneys and lobbyists and give the honest patrons of the road some opportunity to be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdraw the amendment which I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Without objection, the resolutions will be modified in the manner indicated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and the question is on agreeing to the resolutions as modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that he was willing to have the matter referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir. The resolutions are a direction to the Committee on Pacific Railroads to furnish the Senate with this information.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the resolutions by adding what I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolutions:

And that the Committee on Pacific Railroads shall have authority to send for persons and papers, when necessary, in conducting any investigation into the subjects within their jurisdiction and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he offer that as a separate resolution; otherwise it will carry the whole subject to the Committee on Contingent Expenses and postpone action.

Mr. MORGAN. It does not carry anything to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. It does not propose any appropriation at all.

Mr. PLATT. It proposes an expenditure.

Mr. MORGAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. HARRIS. It creates a charge on the contingent fund, I suggest.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no occasion for any expense in administering an oath to Mr. Huntington when he appears before the committee to make a statement.

Mr. HOAR. I believe that all committees, by statute, have the authority to administer oaths to witnesses, but the sending for persons and papers, I suppose, involves the public obligation to pay the expenses of the persons sent for and to pay the expense of sending for them.

Mr. MORGAN. The difficulty with the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is this: The Senate has not directed the committee to make any investigation. We have no more authority to make an investigation than any other committee of the body, and I do not think we can put any and every man on oath who happens to come before the committee to make a suggestion. If we have authority to administer oaths, which this amendment gives, then to-morrow when the committee meet and Mr. Huntington and other gentlemen appear there to make their statements, we can put them under oath, and I want them under oath. There is no appropriation in that at all, and it need not go to any committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That I may understand the matter, do I understand the effect of the adoption of the amendment would be to send the resolutions and amendment to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says he thinks it does, and we value his opinion very highly over here.

Mr. HOAR. Thank you.

Mr. PLATT. Let the rule or the statute be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the rule on the subject.

The Secretary read paragraph 4 of Rule XXV, as follows:

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of three Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read the section of the Revised Statutes to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers:

SEC. 101. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama that there must be a case under examination, but whenever there is a case under examination there is no need of inserting in the resolution authority to administer oaths to witnesses, because that is provided for by the statute.

Mr. MORGAN. That means an examination by order of the Senate, of course, but the committee can not voluntarily institute an examination, and that gives no legal standing to the examination whatever. If the authority is granted and if a man should swear to a lie before the committee we could put him in the penitentiary.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask if the President of the Senate has passed upon the question whether the amendment would carry the resolutions to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the suggestions of Senators upon that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses, of which I happen to be a member, I will venture to suggest to the Chair—and I do it very modestly—that it seems to me that the passage of the resolutions will necessarily create a charge upon the contingent fund. If that be so, under the rule or the statute, as read, the resolutions ought to go, and must necessarily go, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that under the last clause of Rule XXV, which reads "to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same," the resolutions will go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate——

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the amendment been adopted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the event of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. That is the judgment of the Chair upon the question.

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to lay upon the table the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would that motion, if agreed to, carry with it the resolutions already adopted?

Mr. HOAR. I appeal to the Senator from Alabama to make his amendment a separate resolution. It would be just as forcible then as in the form of an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. If I can get an assurance from the committee that the men who are coming up to testify shall not be heard until a resolution is passed by the Senate giving us power to conduct an investigation, so that the witnesses can be put under oath and held responsible for what they say, I will accept the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is all right.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table and will let the members of the committee settle it in their own way. Whatever they desire to do will be satisfactory to me. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table if I may be allowed to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama. Does the Senator from Alabama offer it as a separate resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw it as an amendment and offer it as a separate resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. PLATT. As modified?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is the pending resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the resolution by striking out so much of it as provides for sending for persons and papers, so that it will merely contain power to conduct an investigation. We have volunteers so far. It is not necessary to send for anybody.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. MORGAN. The resolution will not be referred, I suppose, under the ruling of the Chair, if I modify it so as to obviate any possible necessity for expense.

I will state to the Senate very briefly what I want to do. Up to this time the investigations before that committee have been conducted by the voluntary attendance of men who are there for the purpose of promoting their own interests in connection with these railways. When they are there, and come under such conditions and such circumstances and for such purposes, I want the Senate to give us the authority to conduct an examination, so that we can put them under oath and have whatever advantage that may be to the country in the outcome.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if any portion of the investigation thus far has been conducted under oath?

Mr. MORGAN. Not a bit of it.

Mr. ALLEN. Nobody has been sworn?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. MORGAN. I modify my resolution as I have suggested.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska? The suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama, it seems to me, is extremely pertinent.

In answer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], however, I think it is proper to say that I think the committee has undoubtedly possessed the right throughout all its investigations up to this time to put any of its witnesses under oath, had it seen fit to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has it done so?

Mr. WOLCOTT. As a matter of fact nothing has come before the committee except on the general line of suggestions of schemes by counsel which they announce they intend hereafter to present to the committee by way of bills for their consideration.

Nobody familiar with the facts, nobody whose testimony would have added value if it was sworn to, has appeared before the committee. We have not reached that stage of the investigation. But the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama is extremely pertinent, and in my opinion it should be presented in the form of a separate resolution, because then it will not limit the committee to the questions asked in the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], but will enable us to make a general investigation of all phases and sides of this question. I have no doubt that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate will make prompt report upon it.

I can assure the Senator from Nebraska that when anybody who has anything to say, whose testimony would have added value if it were sworn to, appears before the committee, he will unquestionably be compelled to verify his statements by oath. But up to this time nothing but the usual and formal introductory statements by people of something they intended hereafter to do has been submitted to the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I infer from what the Senator from Colorado has said that all that has been done thus far has been to listen to the promulgation of schemes of reorganization.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, that is all.

Mr. ALLEN. There has been no investigation into the facts embraced in the resolution?

Mr. WOLCOTT. None whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. As modified the resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads shall have authority, when necessary, to conduct any investigation into the subjects within their jurisdiction, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

SETTLERS ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota.

The bill simply proposes to allow the settlers on certain Indian reservations in the State of South Dakota additional time within which to pay for their homesteads, and as some of them would have to do it this month the necessity is great that the bill should be considered at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill an additional section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the time for making final proof and payment for all lands located under the homestead laws of the United States upon any lands of any former Indian reservation in the State of South Dakota be, and the same is hereby, extended for the period of one year from the time proof and payment would become due under existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and for other purposes."

MARYLAND AND WASHINGTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the bill in relation to extending the time for the completion of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives indicated by the Senator, which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the building of the road of said company under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 56) extending the time for completion of Washington and Maryland Railway be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

WITNESSES BEFORE POLICE TRIAL BOARDS, ETC.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent, without displacing the unfinished business except temporarily, to call up a bill received yesterday from the House of Representatives, in relation to false swearing before police and fire department trial boards in the District of Columbia. It is identically the same as the bill on this subject reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill coming from the House of Representatives, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the bill (S. 323) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF OBSCENE LITERATURE, ETC.

Mr. VILAS. By consent of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I ask leave to call up Senate bill 1675, in relation to obscene literature. I will state that a similar bill passed the Senate during the last Congress.

Mr. HALE. After the matter suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin is disposed of, I think I shall have to insist upon going on with the appropriation bill. It is very desirable that it shall be passed to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1675) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and was interrupted by—

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it requires unanimous consent to take up this bill, while I have not the slightest desire to postpone its consideration, I should like to look it over a little before it comes up for passage.

Mr. VILAS. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know whether I do or not. I have never read the bill. Has the bill been before the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. VILAS. The bill was passed by the Senate during the last Congress. It has been very carefully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Did it pass in the form in which it is now presented? I understand not.

Mr. VILAS. There are some amendments made by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. VILAS. The bill as it stands now was reintroduced after the Committee on the Judiciary had carefully gone over it in respect to terms, and so as to present the bill just as the committee thought it ought to be enacted.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Wisconsin has stated that the bill was passed during the last Congress. If the Senator will state that the bill as now offered has heretofore passed the Senate, I shall not have a word to say.

Mr. VILAS. With the exception of the amendments which were made to its terms by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes; but it is an amended bill.

Mr. VILAS. It is somewhat slightly different and improved, as it was believed by the committee, from the way in which it was passed at the last session.

Mr. HOAR. It is made less harsh. If I recollect aright, we struck out the minimum punishment as well as a provision leveled at persons who received such matter from the express companies for distribution in a State. We thought that properly belongs to the States. It is merely the giving to express companies knowingly of obscene matter which is made punishable. There is nothing in the bill in the way of penalty which was not in the former bill, if I recollect it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he allow the reading of the bill to be completed and then let the bill go over for a day, during which time the Senator can look at it.

Mr. MILLS. That is a good idea.

Mr. CHANDLER. It will not be necessary to read the bill again to-morrow. If the Senator wants to look at it, I do not think its consideration should be urged at this time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not wish even to appear to object to the passage of a bill of this sort. At the same time I have not read it and it has not been referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, where bills affecting the carrying of goods would naturally go. Probably it is a perfectly just and upright measure, and I do not like, as I say, to seem even for a moment to object to the bill. I shall not object if the Senator from Wisconsin feels that the bill ought to be passed at once without investigation.

Mr. VILAS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator from Colorado investigate the bill, and the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is entirely satisfactory to me if the Senator from Colorado wishes the time to examine it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I ask that the reading may be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded.

Mr. VILAS. I will pursue the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and with the consent of the Senate, ask that the bill may be considered as having been read and stand over until to-morrow morning or some convenient time for disposition; and if there is any objection at that time it can be heard.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILROAD.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the concurrent resolution of the other House requesting the return of a bill be laid before the Senate and adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby requested to return to the House Senate bill 879, for the correction of a verbal error.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, to insert after line 18 on page 18:

For payment of fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, fiscal year 1895, $230,573.34.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, on yesterday while speaking in reference to the fee system the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] alluded to the courts in the Indian Territory as being an example where the fee system had been shown to be peculiarly extravagant. In the course of his remarks he also made some reference to the court in the western district of Arkansas which has jurisdiction over felonies committed in the Indian Territory.

I made a statement at that time in reference to the comparative cost of the two systems as they refer to the courts within the Indian Territory. I did not have the accurate figures, but I have since then obtained them from the Attorney-General's Office, and I wish to make a statement now with reference to what has occurred within that Territory.

When the court was first created within the Indian Territory it was under the fee system, but on the 3d of March last additional courts were created and the whole was put under the salary system. During the last six months it was under the fee system the cost of the marshal's office was $36,074.50. The cost for the first six months under the salary system was $37,800, being more than $1,000 more under the salary system than it was under the fee system.

I wish to suggest, also, that under the salary system, which cost $1,000 more for six months than the other, there were only 45 deputy marshals, while under the fee system the average number of deputy marshals was 175. Yet under the salary system the cost was greater for the 45 deputies than it was for 175 under the other system.

Mr. President, I agree with the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I understand it to be the opinion also of the Attorney-General, that the best mode of dealing with this matter would be to make the salary system apply to the marshals, district attorneys, and office deputies, but the salary system can not be made effective within that Territory without tremendous cost if it is to apply to what is known as the traveling deputies. It would require such a large number of them that if you were to place them on a salary the cost would greatly exceed what it has ever been under the fee system. So far as concerns the marshals, district attorneys, and office deputies, I think it would be better that they should be under the salary system rather than the fee system, but the salary system can not be applied economically to the riding deputies or traveling deputies in the Territory, because it requires such an immense number of them to enforce the law and keep the peace.

The Senator from Missouri yesterday, in speaking of the expense of the courts of the western district of Arkansas, compared it with the southern district of New York. The Senator from Missouri knows that no such comparison can be made. The court of the United States for the southern district of New York has no jurisdiction over murders, larcenies, robberies, and other felonies committed within the State of New York, while the court at Fort Smith has entire jurisdiction over felonies of every character and description.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator means in the Indian Territory?

Mr. BERRY. Within the Indian Territory. It has entire jurisdiction over felonies committed within certain portions of the Indian Territory, and every class of the higher crimes. If the Senator from Missouri would take the expenses of the State courts having criminal jurisdiction in the southern district of New York and add them to the expenses of the United States courts for that district, and compare those expenses with the expenses at Fort Smith, he would have something like a just comparison. But there can be no comparison between the United States courts in New York and the court at Fort Smith. The court in the southern district of New York, I suppose, tries only a few criminal cases, robberies of post-offices, counterfeiting cases, probably smuggling cases, and a few of that character; but the court at Fort Smith has all the felony jurisdiction within certain limits of the Indian Territory.

For the information of the Senator from Missouri I wish to show him something about the business before the Fort Smith court during the year ended June 30, 1895. There were 909 cases disposed of within that court; 662 convictions were had; 158 acquittals; and 89 nolle prosequis or dismissals. Now, bear in mind that with the exception of the whisky cases these are felonies—murders, robberies, rapes, larcenies, and every other character of felonies known to the law. These parties were tried at Fort Smith. The only misdemeanors were those for introducing whisky into the Territory, I think, which may be a felony or which may be a misdemeanor.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas a question, in order that there may be no mistake?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. These are cases which came from the Indian Territory to Fort Smith?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir; I understand they were; that is, the district attorney made his report, and they cover the cases within the Indian Territory.

Mr. President, the court for the southern district of New York has no such jurisdiction and no such number of cases. It is wholly different. The expense attending the service of process in New York is comparatively small. There are to-day, as I believe, about 250 persons confined in the jail at Fort Smith charged with felony. The number has sometimes reached 300; it has not been less than 200 for years, so an employee at the Attorney-General's Office told me. Judge Parker works from 8 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening every day, day by day, almost the entire year; and notwithstanding that fact, there were a short time ago between 40 and 50 men charged with murder in that jail.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday stated that this is the most expensive court in the United States. It is the most expensive, and it could not be otherwise under the circumstances. It does more business than any other court in the United States. The entire Indian Territory has within it, in addition to 75,000 Indians, something like 300,000 white men, and among them are some of the most desperate felons who have ever been known in the United States. They are men who have taken refuge there from other States. They are desperadoes of the very worst character. It is absurd to talk about four deputy marshals, a dozen marshals, or fifty marshals keeping the peace and enforcing the law within that Territory. Those desperadoes a few months ago while engaged in robbing trains and murdering citizens numbered far more than this.

In regard to the marshal at Fort Smith, Mr. Crump, I wish to state that I have known him from his boyhood. I have been associated intimately with him for nearly forty years. He is a man of high intelligence, a man of high sense of honor, and of as high character for integrity and honesty as there is within any State. He has used every exertion and finally succeeded, something less than a year ago, in breaking up the nest of robbers who were located there. Many of them have been sent to the penitentiary for life. Two of them, Cherokee Bill and Henry Starr, who were the leaders, were convicted, and are to-day under sentence of death. One or two others have been already hung, and the band has been broken up.

If any Senator imagines that there is any similarity between that court and any other court in the United States he is wholly misinformed as to the situation. No more efficient set of officers, no more honorable gentlemen than the district attorney, Mr. Reed, and the marshal live within the United States, and the record of convictions shows that they have one of the best records that has been made anywhere. The Attorney-General says, when you take all of the cases throughout the United States, about 40 per cent of them were noll-prossed. In this court during that year there were only a little more than 10 per cent noll-prossed, and many of those cases were where the parties had been indicted more than once. And any intimation that they have used their offices to increase their fees is not warranted by the facts.

The expenses of that court have not been excessive during the last year. If the Senator from Missouri will take the record in the Attorney-General's Office and take the amount of cost there, he will see that the court has been run in as economical a way as it was possible to enforce the law. The marshal has enforced the law and has broken up the robbers; many of them have been sent to the penitentiary and some have been executed, and some are now under conviction.

Now, I wish to say another word. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was not in his seat a moment ago, and I wish now to restate the figures. I say in regard to the deputy marshals it is not possible to enforce the law with a limited number, and if you put the whole number on a salary of $1,200 a year the cost will far exceed the fee system. The court to which the Senator alluded, the court for the western district of Arkansas, bears no resemblance to the courts in which he says parties are dragged for minor offenses. There are no minor offenses tried there, for the jurisdiction has been taken away from them so far as it applies to misdemeanors, except in whisky cases, as I have heretofore stated, which may be a misdemeanor or which may be a felony.

While I am on my feet I wish to say that I think the time has come when there should be legislation in regard to that Territory. I believe a Territorial government should be established within the Indian Territory; that a governor should be appointed, a legislature provided for, and that all the machinery of the Territorial government should be put in operation at the earliest date possible. But until that is done we will be compelled to retain that felony jurisdiction at Fort Smith and Paris with the courts there now. With the jurisdiction of misdemeanors that is placed upon them, if you also add the jurisdiction of felonies now at Fort Smith and Paris, it is not possible that the law can be enforced with the means at the command of the courts now in the Territory.

The Senator from Missouri said it was understood that a proposition is going to be made to extend the time when the jurisdiction shall be taken from Fort Smith and Paris. Unless there is legislation of another character, looking to the Territorializing of that government, it will be absolutely necessary that the time shall be extended. If you to-day take those courts and put upon them the additional jurisdiction now held by the Paris court and the Fort Smith court in felony cases it is not possible that the law can be enforced or that trials can be had for years to come. Those courts are already behind with the misdemeanor jurisdiction, and, as I have said, there are to-day in the jail at Fort Smith more than 200 desperadoes charged with felonies. There are no jails in the Territory in which to keep those felons. It is not possible in the present conditions that peace and order and quiet can be restored and kept there unless some radical action is taken changing the form of the government, or unless the courts at Paris and Fort Smith shall retain for the time being the felony jurisdiction.

So far as I am concerned, I would not vote to retain the jurisdiction at Fort Smith and Paris if the laws could be better enforced in the Territory; but until a Territorial government is created it is absolutely necessary for the protection of life and property. I have no desire or disposition to take one foot of land that belongs to the Indians. No Senator upon this floor, as I hope, wishes to wrong one of them in any way whatever. But the conditions which exist there all sensible men who live in that locality know can not be continued, and until Congress takes charge of it and legislates in the only way, as I believe, that will be effective, to establish a Territorial government, these expenses will continue, and these deputy marshals, not a dozen, not 40, but from 100 to 200, will be an absolute necessity.

I thought proper to put these statements upon the record because of the remarks that were made yesterday.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the subject of miscellaneous suits in the United States courts in the Indian Territory, and ask him whether he can give me any light on that subject. I am not prepared to criticise, from my own knowledge, the conduct of the criminal business in those courts, notwithstanding the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. As I said yesterday, I have had some complaints sent to me in connection with the expenses of the courts of the Indian Territory which I have been unwilling to bring in here without further examination. I have only the records of the Attorney-General's Office, which I have been able to examine cursorily, and I am now looking at the report of the miscellaneous suits in the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1895, pages 153, 154, 155. I will read the number of the suits in some of the States where they are the fewest: California, northern district, 10——

Mr. BERRY. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am reading from page 153 of the Attorney-General's report.

California, northern district, 10; California, southern district, 11. The aggregate sued for in the northern district in the 10 suits is $15,242,451.93. I suppose that includes the suit against the Stanford estate. Connecticut, 3 suits, amounting to $1,000; District of Columbia, 1 suit, $287.44; Indiana, 18 suits, no amount given; Illinois, northern district, 28 suits, $12,666.58; Illinois, southern district, 7 suits. Maine—the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will notice—Maine has brought 6 miscellaneous suits; amount sued for, $4,500; Massachusetts, 35 suits, $5,486.28 sued for; New York, northern district, 39 suits; New York, western district, 18 suits; New York, southern district, 38 suits; Pennsylvania, eastern district, 28 suits; Pennsylvania, western district, 21 suits; Rhode Island, 16 suits, $18,931.30 sued for.

Now, I turn to the number of suits in the Indian Territory. Indian Territory, northern district, 428 suits; Indian Territory, central, 432 suits; Indian Territory, southern district, 419 suits.

Mr. President, that is something remarkable. Perhaps the Senator can give some explanation of it. There are other large numbers given. For instance, in western Arkansas there were 232 suits brought; in North Carolina, the western district, 567 suits were brought; in Oklahoma, which is a separate court, I suppose, from this Indian Territory court, 864 suits were brought; western Virginia, 242 suits. In all the other States the number of suits is comparatively limited, but the moment you strike Oklahoma you have this enormous number of 864 suits. In western North Carolina there were 567 suits. As Alabama was referred to, I will state the number in the districts of Alabama. Alabama, northern, 214; Alabama, middle, 177; Alabama, southern, 118. Now we come again to the Indian Territory, and there in the three districts we have 1,500 suits brought, probably about one-fourth of all the miscellaneous suits brought in behalf of the United States throughout the whole section of the country.

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire an answer?

Mr. CHANDLER. Wait one moment.

Mr. PLATT. I understand the figures which the Senator from New Hampshire is now reading do not include the Fort Smith cases, which go from the Indian Territory to Fort Smith, but only those cases which are brought in Arkansas.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, there are found in the western district of Arkansas 232 cases. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas in a moment. I only want to ask him, in all good faith, whether he can account for this extraordinary number of suits brought in the Indian Territory, which, according to the same table of results reached, judgments rendered, judgments collected, seem to have been unproductive of any considerable amount of good to the Government, in whose behalf they were brought?

Mr. BERRY. The remarks that I made were principally with reference to the western district of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire understands that the court at Fort Smith is located on the border of the Territory; that it has jurisdiction over a certain part of the Indian Territory in felony cases and the remainder of the jurisdiction in felony cases in that Territory is in Paris, Tex. It was with reference to that court that the remarks I made were in answer to the Senator from Missouri principally. However, I did make a statement showing the cost in the Indian Territory courts outside of the Fort Smith and Paris courts. There are three courts within the Indian Territory which have jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases and have civil jurisdiction also between parties where one of them is a white man and the other an Indian located within the Territory. They are different entirely from the western district of Arkansas; but the Arkansas court has the usual jurisdiction of United States courts in the western district of Arkansas, and then has, in addition, this felony jurisdiction within the Indian Territory. Now, as to what is intended by using the words "miscellaneous suits" by the Attorney-General, my attention has not been called to it before, but I imagine that they refer to the civil suits pending between various parties in those courts, because those courts have the same jurisdiction between Indians and white persons in the Territory that the State courts have in New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that these are suits in behalf of the United States.

Mr. BERRY. It does not so state.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will examine he will see that no judgment was rendered in any one of the Indian cases, either for or against the United States, but I imagine that those in the western district of Arkansas refer to trespasses upon the public lands, as cutting timber where it was not authorized, in the State of Arkansas. There may be some of them that refer to some suits for violation of the revenue laws. I do not know about that, but from the fact that Oklahoma has 800 cases, I would imagine if you will investigate it you will find it includes the civil jurisdiction that is reported under these miscellaneous judgments. I know nothing about Oklahoma except in the general way the Senator knows it; but if there are 800 cases there, I imagine that it applies to the Territorial jurisdiction given to those courts which is generally given in the States to State courts. The Senator can investigate that for himself. I do not know of any extraordinary number of suits that could be brought in the Indian Territory by or against the United States except it might be suits on forfeited bonds, or something of that character, or some violation of the revenue laws in some way which I do not know about. The Senator has the same information about that that I have. In looking at that report, where the columns run up in the judgments rendered or dispensed with or disposed of, the Senator will see there is nothing said in regard to the Indian Territory.

Mr. CHANDLER. My belief is that those are all United States suits, and of course I thought the Senator from Arkansas might know how we could account for 1,300 of those suits in the three Indian Territory districts, and how we could account for the 800 in the Oklahoma district. Whether they are suits inter partes or whether they are United States suits, of course there is an expense connected with them; and the question at once arises whether litigation is not being increased and lawsuits multiplied there for the purpose, may it not be fairly suspected, of increasing fees and costs, notwithstanding the burden that is thereby imposed upon the United States Treasury?

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me one moment? In regard to these civil suits, if it refers to civil suits, and I take it it does, these courts have the same jurisdiction that your State court in New Hampshire has between citizens of your own State, because this is a Territorial court, and where one of the parties is an Indian and the other a white man suits are brought in these courts. Whether these are civil suits or a suit by the United States I do not know, but if they are United States cases I can not imagine where 800 would come from in the Territory of Oklahoma.

Now, one other word in regard to the purpose of the marshal and the district attorney in trying to increase their fees. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will give me his attention. That conclusion may not be inferred. I have already stated to the Senator that inside of that Territory the marshals and their deputies are on a salary. It is a fixed amount, and no profit could come to them by reason of trying to get up cases. Upon the contrary, I was informed in the Attorney-General's Office this morning that since they have been put on a salary many of them fail to execute the law because they get the same amount whether they ride or whether they do not.

Now, in regard to the Fort Smith court. They are under the fee system; but neither the marshal nor the district attorney could have any reason there to try to increase the suits for the reason that the maximum sum which they can receive as compensation is $6,000, and you will see that the fees in each case amount to more than $10,000. It has never failed to come up to the maximum sum. It is not necessary to hunt business to bring it up to $6,000. It runs over it always, and has done so for years. The fees in both cases during the fiscal year ending in 1895 for the district attorney and the marshal amount to more than $10,000, though of course under the law they could only retain the $6,000, and the balance was covered into the Treasury.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have been requested by the officer attached to the courts of the southern district of Florida to say a word upon this subject. The judge of that court has gained the confidence and respect of the people of that State. He is a Republican and has been an incumbent of the office for many years, and he is regarded with very high respect and esteem as a man of integrity, of learning, and an able judge. The marshal and the district attorney are men of very high character. Against none of those officers can there be any kind of imputation by suggesting that they have by any indirect methods sought to increase their legitimate compensation. They are very desirous of the passage of a law making these offices salaried offices and giving to them a reasonable compensation.

In that State, where the distances are very great and the commissioners necessarily live at a very great distance from each other, the expenses of even a small number of criminal cases are necessarily very large, and while this can not be avoided in any other manner than by their changing the character of the commissioners who are appointed, or diminishing their numbers, or limiting their jurisdiction, the fault is not to be found with the presiding judge or with the marshal or district attorney, but in the law itself. The marshal has no power of issuing a warrant. It must come from the commissioner and upon cause, and the number of cases which the jurisdiction of the court is extended to must be diminished if you wish to reduce the cost which is incurred in the discretion of this commissioner.

But, Mr. President, I hope that this subject will be brought to the consideration of the Judiciary Committee and the Senate, and that immediately and without delay in those districts where it can be done advantageously to the Government salaries may be provided for the officers and the fee system dispensed with. I am authorized to say that this is the universal sentiment of the courts and officers connected with them in the State of Florida. That is the information which I have, and I have been urged to bring the subject to the consideration of the Senate and urge its immediate and favorable action.

Upon the general subject of the increase of judicial expenses I have here a petition sent to me from southern California by Mr. Blanton Duncan, a citizen and lawyer of ability, which contains within it the decretal order of a judge—Judge Ross, of southern California—granting an injunction against the railroad employees of the Southern California Railroad Company, commanding them to continue in the performance of their contracted work or duty as stated by him, and imposing pains and penalties for refusing to work for the corporation. I will not detain the Senate to read it, but will print a few lines from it. There was a service of this order upon three citizens of the State of Illinois by telegraph to the marshal of Illinois, and as I understand this statement it embraced all the employees of the Railway Union in that region of the country, numbering a great many thousand.

The order of injunction is as follows:

> And each of you and each of your agents, servants, and assistants, while remaining in the employment of the Southern California Railway Company are hereby enjoined and restrained from refusing to switch, handle, or assist in switching or hauling any cars or train of cars belonging to or in possession of or under control of the said Southern California Railway Company.
> Your affiant states that subsequently the said Ross delivered a charge to the grand jury, as follows [Exhibit 4], and that this judge instructed the filing of proceedings in this district against three citizens of Chicago in the name of the United States and had service made upon them by telegraph to the marshal of Illinois, as follows [Exhibit 5], a usurpation of power never before known by affiant, the members of the American Railway Union, as affiant is informed, numbering many thousands, and resident in about thirty States of the Union, and none of their names being given except three. [Exhibit 5.]

Now, if there be no restraint upon an exercise of this kind of judicial power, saying nothing whatever in regard to its expediency, its constitutionality, or its lawfulness—I say if there be no restraint upon the exercise of this power, which is nothing more than the old lettres de câchet existing in France previous to the revolution, the expenses of the judicial tribunals of the United States will amount to many, many times more than they do now. They will increase up to the amount necessary to sustain even a standing army of employees. Injunctions addressed to a hundred thousand men, and embracing within their scope action encouraging their fellows in certain lines of duty or of conduct, illegal or legal, whichever it may be, will increase the expenses of these tribunals until there will be no satisfying them by appropriations.

But the Senator from New Hampshire must of necessity be wrong, because whatever jurisdiction the courts exercise, the number of cases which come before them can not be estimated. They are exceptional; they arise from exceptional circumstances; and the judge, who is the presiding officer charged with the supervision of these accounts, can alone exercise a just supervision over them, and even he is not enabled to do it, because the commissioners having authority to issue these warrants can not submit each case to him, nor can he, when the law is complied with and an affidavit made of the commission of an offense, say to the commissioner, "You shall not take cognizance of this case for which probable cause is alleged before you." Therefore you can have no reliance except in diminishing the jurisdiction of the court and diminishing the number of criminal offenses.

For myself I am free to say that the jurisdiction of all courts is too greatly extended to minor offenses, which ought not to become matters of judicial cognizance. The good morals and good order of a community are not increased by creating a jurisdiction over every small immorality or offense. It is better to leave these to public opinion, to the ministers of religion, and to the great agency of the sound and correct judgment and thought of the people. Therefore you have only two methods by which you can accomplish this reduction of expense, either by diminishing the numqer of cases of a trivial character over which the courts have jurisdiction or by elevating the character of the officers before whom these offenses come for the original issue of warrant and process.

This much, Mr. President, I desired to say.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, it is most astonishing that we can not discuss any change in the laws of the land without bringing in the defense of individual officers. In what I said yesterday I did not think of any particular official nor did I intend to make any personal charge against anybody. I spoke of the system. If we are not permitted to discuss the laws of the country and the system established by law, then our functions ought to stop. I have not spoken of any particular marshal or any particular judge. The marshals and the judges of the two districts in Missouri are my personal and political friends, and I was not thinking about them nor about any particular marshals. I do not know who the officials at Fort Smith are, nor do I care. I know, I believe, two of the judges and one of the district attorneys in the Indian Territory, but the remainder of them I know nothing about.

But you can not change men. Their motives will remain the same until the millennium. If you give them inducements to put money into their pockets, those opportunities will be embraced. I do not mean to say that the head officers will do so, but that the subordinates will; and I affirm here again—and every lawyer who practices in the Federal courts knows it—that around these tribunals and around the marshal's office and around the commissioner's office are a gang of hangers-on waiting for jobs to take prisoners to the penitentiary and to the jail, semidetectives, who go out and hunt up these miserable, trivial, little offenses, such as cutting timber on the public lands, selling a pint of whisky without license, infractions of the internal-revenue laws, and dragging innocent and ignorant men hundreds of miles and taking from them all they have. That is what I complain of, and I shall continue to do so as long as I remain a member of this body.

I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] that the crying evil of the Indian Territory is that we do not change the autonomy of their government. The time has come when the United States, as a matter of self-preservation, must take charge of that Territory and break up the tribal relations of the Indians. It is absolutely necessary to the peace and tranquillity and welfare of the whole country, and especially of the States lying immediately contiguous to that Territory. This is so well known that it is not necessary to do anything else than to refer to the Dawes report, which gives a picture of lawlessness and of bad government unparalleled in the history of the United States. Yet there are lobbies here fighting any reform, any change, and demanding that the existing state of things shall continue. We shall never get rid of these evils until we change the government there.

I have myself always opposed these outside courts. I have opposed them, not so much upon the ground of expense—although that is bad enough—as on account of the effect upon the Indians themselves. We claim to be the great exemplars of civilization and Christianity and law; we advocate trial by jury, that every man shall be tried by a jury of his peers, and a republican form of government for the people. Do you expect to make these Indians respect our civilization by dragging them away from their Territory and trying them before juries that have no sympathy, no like opinions, no habits the same? Can we teach them Christianity and law by any such mode as that? Yet we drag them down to Fort Smith and to Paris, Tex., hundreds of miles, and we try them by tribunals where all the tracks go in and none come out.

They do not think it is any hanging at all at Fort Smith unless a half dozen to a dozen are hung. The last I heard of the executioner there he kept his tally on death; he had reached 98, and he hoped to make it an even hundred. Any such system as that ought to be denounced. I do not know the officers. I have very slight acquaintance with the judge there, who formerly lived in the State of Missouri, but I do know that that court, and the records show it—I have not looked at the Attorney-General's report this year, for I have not had the time—but I do know heretofore that that court at Fort Smith has cost more than the courts in the southern district of New York, embracing the cities of New York and Brooklyn.

The expenses that have come from the fees of the marshals constitute one of the smallest of these details of expense. It is in the witnesses; it is in the general expenses that come from the system that has obtained. When you make it to the interest of a deputy marshal to arrest some poor devil and drag him off to jail, the commissioner gets his fees, the clerk gets his fees, the hotels participate in the plunder, and the saloons, and all these combine to make a system that is obnoxious to free institutions and to the administration of justice as it should be.

I repeat, I have always opposed these outside courts. Finally, I am glad to say, I was enabled to do something toward bringing out a compromise by which these outside jurisdictions are to be terminated in a few months from this time; and I want to say now, whenever the proposition comes here to renew that jurisdiction, if I am a member of this body, I shall oppose it to the full extent of my power. It is wrong in principle; it is odious in practice; it increases the expense. I do not care how honest those officers may be—I have nothing to say about that—the whole fee system that puts a premium upon arrests for misdemeanors is wrong and vicious. It says to the officer—and we know the character of these officers; they can not be men in the higher walks of life; they are semidetectives—"Arrest this man and it puts money in your pocket, and it puts money in other people's pockets." We have to-day all over the country, and especially in the West and South, glaring instances of individual wrong, a narrative of which would almost excite consternation in this Chamber and among all reflecting people.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] asked information about these miscellaneous suits. I will tell him what they are. Those are suits by the United States Government against trespassers on the public lands and for violations of the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VEST. Of course.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator tell me what trespass there can be on the public lands in the Indian Territory, where the Government owns no land? The suits in the Indian Territory can not be suits for trespass. My attention was never called to them until the Senator from New Hampshire named them, but I am confident those suits can not be on that account, because the Indian land there does not belong to the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I will venture to suggest that most of them will be found to be prosecutions upon bonds which have been forfeited, where persons have been arrested, or for the collection of a penalty for the violation of a statute, which is to be recovered by a suit rather than by prosecution.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Arkansas will allow me a moment, since this subject has arisen I have looked at the report of the Attorney-General with care, and on page 145 he says the contents of the tables which he enumerates embrace suits in which the United States is a party, or is interested, and not embraced in the other classes; and on page 153 is Table No. 6, report of miscellaneous suits, from which I have read. So these 1,300 suits in the Indian Territory are United States suits.

Mr. BERRY. I am certain that they are not, and that it is a mistake. I shall see the Attorney-General, however, and ascertain.

If the Senator will permit me one other word, I have nothing to say in regard to the statement of the Senator from Missouri as to the Fort Smith court, and that he will oppose it, etc. That is his right, in case there should be an attempt to have it extended. The Senator says it is indefensible because of the small suits which are instituted in order to make fees for the officials.

Mr. VEST. I will not say that about the court at Fort Smith. I spoke generally. I know very well what the jurisdiction of that court is, as I had something to do with framing the law; but the great evil at Fort Smith is in the expense attending the fees of witnesses. I can show the Senator one case there in which the fees of witnesses and the court expenses amounted to more than $12,000.

Mr. BERRY. That was at Paris.

Mr. VEST. At Paris, then. It is the same character of jurisdiction. One court is at Paris, Tex., and the other at Fort Smith. People were dragged from the State of Kansas and from the northern portion of the Indian Territory and kept for weeks and months, until the fees amounted to the enormous sum which I have named. The United States is a party to those suits, as the title of them shows in the table which was cited by the Senator from New Hampshire.

I have no doubt, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] suggests, that a great many of those suits were for forfeitures upon bonds. I do not mean to say that they were for trespasses upon lands in the Indian Territory, but I have no doubt that a great many of the suits in Oklahoma are for trespasses upon the public lands; for that is a favorite mode of extorting money from ignorant persons who do not know where the lines are and get upon Government lands. They are seized by a detective, carried before a commissioner, dragged off to jail, and made to give up all they have got in order to secure their liberty.

In North Carolina I have no doubt that a great many are prosecutions for what is called moonshining, and forfeitures upon bonds given by persons who are arrested under the excise laws of the United States; but all the United States suits in that table belong to the same class; they are misdemeanors, trivial offenses. It is that class of cruelty and oppression and outrage of which I complain in the name of the poorer classes of the people of this country. Because a man happens to have gone across the line to get two or three sticks of timber on Government land, to drag him hundreds of miles away from his family, incarcerate him in jail, and then turn him loose, broken possibly in health, and certainly broken in fortune, is a cruelty which can be defended by nobody, and to cite the high character of United States marshals does not answer my objection. The courts are compelled to use these deputies.

The Senator from Arkansas tells us that the salary system has not saved money in the Indian Territory. I have not examined it, but I have no doubt his statement is true. When, however, we consider the salary system and the fee system, it requires no argument and but little inquiry to show that the difference is in favor of the salary system. By its adoption you do away with the incentive, the temptation to oppression, and that is worth everything else in a free government, such as ours is supposed to be. The personal liberty of the citizen is worth everything else to him, and any system which permits a deputy marshal to seize a man, drag him before a commissioner, and then drag him off to jail for a miserable little misdemeanor like this is wrong, and must be odious to all right-thinking people. I attack the fee system as to United States marshals, clerks, and district attorneys. It is wrong in principle, it is outrageous in practice, and the people of this country and all intelligent lawyers who have watched the practice under it must come to the conclusion that it ought to be done away with.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have become a convert to the opinion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] in regard to the system of compensating marshals throughout the country generally by salaries, instead of fees. I have always favored having the district attorneys and clerks paid by salaries, and not by fees; but there is a difficulty in the case of marshals. You are not going to get a man to go out at the risk of his life to arrest a buccaneering expedition; you are not going to get him to go out at the risk of his life to hunt up unlawful distilleries where he may have a bullet come from a thicket as he rides along, and you are not going to have a man watch against smuggling on a cold winter night on the New England coast, where he is in great personal danger, or, at any rate, is to suffer very much, on a salary where he gets just as much if he does not perform that duty as if he does. At the same time the evil, which the Senator from Missouri has so graphically and so frequently depicted, exists, and is the subject of great complaint all over the country. I think the opinion of the intelligent men who watch the workings of United States courts is that between the evil which I have imperfectly and briefly suggested and the evils pointed out by the Senator from Missouri in general there will be less public evil by having the salary system for the marshal and his principal deputies. At any rate, it is best to try it for a time, and I hope the bill providing for it will be laid before the Senate very soon.

But as to the Indian Territory, I think almost all the persons who have carefully examined that think it must be made an exception to the general rule. I believe that is the opinion of the Department of Justice. The present head of the Department of Justice and his predecessor have been very zealously in favor of the general reform, and the judges in the Indian Territory, I think, all agree that in the outlying, sparsely settled parts of that Territory you can not on a salary support marshals who will be ready for all emergencies. At the same time, certainly in the present lawless and disturbed condition there, you must have some officials representing the United States and ready instantly and promptly to interfere in case of any violation of the law. The only way you can do that will be to have, in addition to the regular force of officers of the court, a few deputies who shall be compensated by fees, endeavoring to have a maximum that they shall not go beyond, which will not be likely to exceed what the necessary exercise of their authority will require. So this evil will be prevented, so far as may be, by a strict and rigid maximum to which they may be confined in their revenues in any one year or in any one month. I think the Senator from Missouri will himself be of the opinion, on going thoroughly into the condition of things in the Indian Territory, that we must have a few deputies there paid by fees.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that there are many judicial districts where the compensation is paid in fees, where the officers act with strict integrity and fairness, and without straining the law, and those fees are insufficient to compensate a man of valuable qualities for the service. I refer to the State of Florida. The fees there, where the law is administered without harshness and without interfering with the just rights of the people, are not sufficient to compensate men of the character that the courts must have to rely upon to fairly execute the law.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Chair what amendment is now under consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 18, it is proposed to add:

For payment of fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, fiscal year 1895, $230,573.34.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Maine to an amendment which is proposed by the Senate committee. As I understand, the committee proposes to add $230,573.34 to the House item for fees of marshals and deputies for a deficiency for the year 1895. That, then, is undoubtedly an appropriation for audited accounts for that year.

The Senator on yesterday was understood to say that the whole appropriation inserted by the House of Representatives of $960,000 was for audited accounts already rendered, for work already done and expenditures already made. The Senator said that, but I think he overlooked the proviso in the appropriation which I shall now read:

For payment of the fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, $960,000: Provided, That not exceeding $500,000 of this appropriation may be advanced to marshals, to be accounted for in the usual way, the residue to remain in the Treasury, to be used, if at all, only in the payment of the accounts of marshals in the manner provided in section 856, Revised Statutes.

I understand from that clause that $500,000 is to be advanced to the marshals and is not already expended. Bills for $460,000, or substantially that amount, have already been incurred, and $460,000 will pay those bills to the marshals by Treasury certificates in the manner provided in section 856 of the Revised Statutes.

Now, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the estimates for the marshals' fees for the whole year ending June 30, 1896, are only $1,400,000. The committee proposes to appropriate $675,000. If the committee had appropriated the whole amount estimated for they would only have appropriated $725,000, which would have made $1,400,000, the full estimate. The House of Representatives has appropriated $725,000, which would make the total amount originally asked for $960,000, and I understood the Senator to say that in his belief there would undoubtedly be a further deficiency appropriation asked for before the close of this session. Now I venture to ask the Senator, why not make this appropriation $725,000 instead of $960,000? The Senator proposes to appropriate $230,573.34 for the bills in arrears for 1895. Why, then, not limit the appropriation at this time for the present fiscal year to $725,000 instead of $960,000, as proposed by the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall move at some later stage to reduce the appropriation of $960,000 to $725,000, which was the original estimate.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 19, line 3, after the date "1895," to strike out "$57,639.22," and insert "$72,461.07," so as to make the clause read:

For 1895, $72,461.07.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 10, after the date "1895," to strike out "$38,898.35," and insert "$58,513.87," so as to make the clause read:

For 1895, $58,513.87.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 21, after the date "1895," to strike out "$71,934.28," and insert "$75,836.93," so as to make the clause read:

For 1895, $75,836.93.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, a word about these commissioners' fees. The amount asked for the present year was $290,000. The regular appropriation was only $100,000, which was, of course, a deliberate, but arbitrary, cutting down of the estimate. The House of Representatives have provided as a deficiency for $240,000, making $340,000 at least to be expended, when only $290,000 is estimated for, with a probable deficit in the future. I call attention to the vigorously expressed opinion of the present Attorney-General on page 6 of his report in reference to the commissioners:

There is now no limit to the number of commissioners which the courts may appoint. In some places more seem to have been appointed than are required, and many of them appear to think that appointment entitles them to a living support from the Government. The number of commissioners ought to be limited at all events.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 20, after line 3, to insert:

For fees of jurors, fiscal year 1895, $103.45.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 7, to insert:

For fees of witnesses, fiscal year 1895, $30,722.38.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 11, on page 22.

Mr. CHANDLER. This appropriation, I think, requires some explanation. It is an appropriation to pay money of the United States for taking care of property in the hands of receivers in United States courts. I ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to tell me, if he knows, how much has hitherto been appropriated, in addition to the proposed deficiency appropriation, for such expenditures for protecting property in the hands of receivers?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from New Hampshire will let this item be passed over for a moment, I will have the original provision hunted up, and we will go back to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 22, after line 11, to insert:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suit, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," certified to Congress at its present session by the Attorney-General in House Document No. 157, which have not been appealed, $22,866.25, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 2, to insert:

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, reported to Congress at its present session in Senate Document No. 70, $441,104.80: Provided, That none of the judgments herein provided for shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is a very large portion of the addition made by the committee to the bill as it comes from the other House. The report to which I alluded yesterday, Senate Document No. 70, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, shows that nearly all the judgments which are to be paid are those on account of extra pay for letter carriers. At the close of the document there is this large judgment:

Berdan Firearms Manufacturing Company, December 8, 1890, $95,004.36.

It was presented for payment December 10, 1890, the claim being for patent devices for converting muzzle-loading into breech-loading firearms. There appears to be included "interest on this judgment from December 10, 1890, to March 4, 1895, at 4 per cent (26 Stat. L., page 537)."

I desire to ask the Senator from Maine whether he knows anything more in reference to this judgment than what is contained in the document I have here, and why there has been this delay in the payment until the sum of $16,000 in interest has accumulated on it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has the papers in the case, and he is not at present in his seat. I can only say that it was a suit of importance, involving some hundred thousand dollars. It took a long time in consideration and went up to the final court. The committee has put in enough to cover interest at the rate of 4 per cent, which is the rule in all judgments, and I suppose the amount—I did not figure it myself—is cast properly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to know whether the delay in payment has been on account of any idea that the judgment ought not to be paid or whether it is interest on the sum during an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON entered the Chamber.

Mr. CHANDLER. I see the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is now present.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Iowa has the papers.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that there has been some five years' delay in paying the Berdan judgment, during which time there has accumulated interest to the extent of $16,075.26. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether the delay has been on account of any suspicion that the judgment ought not to be paid or whether it has been on account of an appeal to the Supreme Court? What has been the condition of the case since 1890, when the judgment was rendered?

Mr. ALLISON. This is a case where General Berdan sued the Government for the use of two or three very important patents. It was very closely contested before the Court of Claims, and judgment was rendered, I believe, in 1890 or 1891. The case was appealed by both parties to the Supreme Court, neither being satisfied with the judgment of the Court of Claims. The final judgment of the Supreme Court, I think, was rendered as late as May, 1895; certainly after the 4th of March, when the last Congress expired. So, of course, the judgment drew interest during the pendency of the litigation after the judgment of the Court of Claims. That accounts for the large amount of interest which appears here.

Mr. CHANDLER. The payment which the committee now propose shall be made is only after a final judgment by direction of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. After final judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered, I think, in May, 1895, or possibly in April, 1895.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 23, after line 9, to insert:

LEGISLATIVE.

BUILDING FOR THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

For completion of the building for the Library of Congress and for each and every purpose connected with the same, $480,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ three additional assistants, at the rate of $75 a month each, for the remainder of the fiscal year 1896, $1,125, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert:

SENATE.

For compensation and mileage of Senators, $5,000.
For salaries of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, $6,000.
For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $10,000.
For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1895, $2,392.29.
For fuel, oil, and cotton waste, and advertising, for the heating apparatus, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1894, $5.42.
For purchase of furniture, $2,500.
For repairs of furniture, fiscal year 1895, $35.23.
For services in cleaning, repairing, and varnishing furniture, $1,500.
For repairs to Maltby Building, fiscal year 1895, $10.75.
For amount due the Washington Gas Light Company, for coke, fiscal year 1894, $29.52.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to state to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] that I telephoned to the Department of Justice to know what the 800 suits in Oklahoma, contained in the table on page 153 and following, and the 1,200 cases in the Indian Territory referred to. He said they were criminal cases, misdemeanor cases, including some forty or fifty suits on bond.

Mr. CHANDLER. But United States cases in every instance.

Mr. HALE. The reading of the bill having been concluded, there are certain amendments which I desire to offer. On page 13, after line 9, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, after line 9, it is proposed to insert:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: For additional amount for coaling shed, $4,000, and the appropriation of $10,000 for this object made by the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1895 is hereby continued available for the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 13, after line 12, I move to insert:

Increase of the Navy equipment: Toward the completion of the equipment outfit of the new vessels heretofore authorized by Congress, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 15, after line 8, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 8, on page 15, it is proposed to insert:

Commission, Puyallup Reservation; reimbursable: For continuing the work of the Puyallup Commission, appointed under the act of March 3, 1893 (26 Statutes at Large, 612), to select and appraise such portions of the allotted lands within the Puyallup Indian Reservation, Wash., as are not required for homes for the Indian allottees; and also that part of the agency tract, exclusive of the burial ground, not needed for school purposes, and for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said commission, the sum of $10,000, to be available until expended, and to be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of the sale of the agency tract and allotted lands, as provided in said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 15, after line 14, I move to insert:

To pay the audited claim of Alonzo Gesner, United States deputy surveyor, for surveying the public lands in Oregon under contract numbered 608, dated April 17, 1893, $3,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Following the amendment just adopted, I move to insert:

To pay the audited claim of C. Clifford Stevenson and David O. Stevenson for surveying public lands, fiscal year 1893, $3,298.27.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Following the amendment just agreed to, I move to insert:

To pay the audited claim of F. W. Pettigrew, United States deputy surveyor, for surveying public lands, fiscal year 1893, $298.21.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 16, after line 25, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 25, page 16, it is proposed to insert:

Miscellaneous:

Defending suits in claims against the United States: For defraying the necessary expenses incurred in the examination of witnesses and procuring of evidence in the matter of claims against the United States, and in defending suits in the Court of Claims, including the payment of such expenses as in the discretion of the Attorney-General shall be necessary, and for making proper defense for the United States in the matter of French spoliation claims, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 22, after line 5, I move to insert:

For payment of services and expenses of special assistants to the Attorney-General in cases appealed from the Court of Private Land Claims to the Supreme Court, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 23, line 6, after the words "document numbered seventy," I move to insert "and ninety-nine," so as to read: "In Senate document numbered seventy and ninety-nine." It is another document.

Mr. CHANDLER. The amount is not changed?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. And the word "document" in the same line should be changed to "documents."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

Mr. HALE. In line 7, page 23, I move to strike out "one hundred and four" and insert "eight hundred and ninety-one"; so as to read: "$441,891.80."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I believe those are all the committee amendments.

Mr. QUAY. If the committee amendments have been gone through with, I desire to offer an amendment, to come in on page 16, between lines 4 and 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 4, on page 16, it is proposed to insert:

That the Auditor of the Department of the Interior is hereby authorized and required to state the account of Col. A. Wilson Norris, late pension agent at Philadelphia, and the balance found due shall be paid to Mrs. Mertie M. Norris, widow of the said A. Wilson Norris, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After line 14, on page 3, I move to insert:

For payment of cost of transportation furnished by certain railway companies in connection with the failure of the scheme for the colonization of negroes in Mexico, necessitating their return to their homes in Alabama, as reported to Congress at its present session by the President in House Document No. 169, $5,087.09.

This amendment is proposed in pursuance of House Document No. 169, which is a message of the President asking Congress to appropriate this sum of money. Accompanying the message of the President is all the correspondence relating to the matter, the substance of which is that a number of colored people were induced under contract to migrate to Mexico, and did so migrate. Many of them died and others were in a starving condition. The Government was appealed to to give them aid. After a great deal of correspondence in various ways between the State Department and the consul in Durango, the President of the United States, on the 26th day of July, 1895, addressed a telegram from Buzzards Bay to the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Adee, as follows:

War Department will issue rations for one week, and in the meantime, if return to the colony is not practicable or consistent with humane considerations, let the consul assure the railroad company that payment for transportation of sufferers to their homes will be strongly recommended to next Congress, and probably allowed, and if such assurance will not accomplish the purpose, every possible effort must be made to pay for such transportation from emergency fund or some other fund in the State or Treasury Department.

In pursuance of that telegram from the President, the Acting Secretary of State made various efforts to secure the transportation of these colored citizens from the State of Durango to their old home in Alabama. There are several railroads that performed this work at the uniform rate of 1 cent per mile, except that a railway in Mexico, the Mexican International Railway Company, transported these people over their lines at about three-fourths of a cent per mile in our money, amounting perhaps to twice that sum in Mexico.

The matter was called to the attention of the committee after the pending bill had been reported. The Senator from Maine in charge of the bill, finding a long document on the subject, asked me to look into it, which I did. I am satisfied that this money should be paid. I think there is a special claim for its early consideration owing to the fact that the railway companies transported these poor people at the rate of 1 cent per mile on the faith of the Secretary of State that they would be reimbursed. I think it is not a matter that we can very well afford to delay.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to offer an amendment. On page 16, after the amendment already adopted, I move to insert:

Eleventh Census: For salaries, rents, and necessary expenses in continuing the work of compiling the results of the Eleventh Census, to continue available until exhausted, $15,000.

I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Superintendent of Census, dated January 18, 1896, to the Secretary of the Interior, requesting this appropriation to be made, and also a letter from the Commissioner of Labor, in charge of the Census, to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], dated February 3, 1896, stating the importance of having the appropriation made at this time. It is the intention of the Commissioner of Labor, in charge of the Census, to finish all the work of the census before the end of the present fiscal year.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION,
Washington, January 18, 1896.

SIR: I respectfully ask you to recommend that the amount of $15,000 be incorporated in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill for the use of this division, for the following reasons, to wit: There has been deducted at the Treasury Department from funds to our credit the sum of $3,923.49, and applied to the payment of railroad transportation of special agents of the Census Bureau over subsidized roads. These claims are five and six years old, and it was supposed had long since been settled. I was totally unaware of their existence, and their payment was not anticipated.

There will also be presented for payment a claim of about $1,300 for telegraphic service, due the Postal Telegraph Company. This claim was not anticipated. The company declined to accept what was known as the "Wanamaker rates," and said claim has been in abeyance for several years, unknown to this office.

I also beg to say that it will take the sum of $10,000 to finish putting the census schedules in perfect condition. Whether bound or not, this work is necessary to be done. When finished, as I have before stated, I do not think it will be necessary to bind them, thus saving about $30,000 to the Government.

I see no reason for asking for any further appropriation for the completion of the Eleventh Census, as I think the amount now to the credit of the Census Office will enable us to complete all the clerical work.

Very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor, in charge.

The Honorable THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS DIVISION,
Washington, February 3, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: A member of your Committee on the Census has called my attention to objections to the amendment submitted in the Senate January 21, 1896, by Senator CHANDLER; the bill H. R. 4321 being bill making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies, etc., this amendment by Senator CHANDLER covering $15,000 for the Eleventh Census.

Of this sum which we now stand in need, $3,923.49 is to be applied to the payment of railroad transportation on subsidized roads. The claims amounting to this sum are five and six years old, and were, as I supposed, long since settled. I was totally unaware of their existence, and their payment was not anticipated in any recent appropriation. The sum of $1,300 is for telegraphic service due the Postal Telegraph Company, a claim that was not anticipated. It comes under what was known as the "Wanamaker rates," and has been in abeyance for several years, a matter unknown to me. These claims have now been charged to us, reducing the appropriation to our credit for clerical and other work.

The balance of the money called for is for the purpose of putting the census schedules into perfect condition for permanent preservation. This work was provided for last year and the sum of $10,000 added to an appropriation for that purpose, but with the understanding that it might not be sufficient. It proves not to be and is practically exhausted, so that this work will have to be suspended unless provided for at once. With the provision asked for in the amendment this feature of the census work can be completed by the 31st of March. Should it be delayed for the general deficiency bill we should be obliged to suspend this work, discharge the clerks now familiar with it, and then take it up again in the middle of the summer. I submit that this would entail a loss and a delay in closing the work of the Eleventh Census.

The balance of appropriations for clerical work heretofore made is now $25,000, and is, I believe, ample for all clerical work in completing the small amount of copy not yet sent to the printer. To draw on this small balance, however, for putting the schedules into permanent condition would leave us in such shape that before the general deficiency bill could be passed all the work would have to be suspended. I sincerely trust, therefore, that Senator CHANDLER'S amendment will be inserted in the pending urgent deficiency bill, for it is entirely in the interest of efficiency and the early completion of the census work.

I am, very respectfully,

CARROLL D. WRIGHT,
Commissioner of Labor in charge.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Subcommittee on Deficiencies,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. After line 2, on page 11, I move to insert:

Five hundred dollars, to be expended under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, to open Jupiter Inlet, in Florida, for the passage of boats and small vessels; to be immediately available.

I will state that this is an emergency amendment. It has been submitted to the members of the Committee on Commerce and approved by them and by the Department. The necessity for the appropriation arises from a late storm, which has filled up the passage into Indian River from Jupiter Inlet and prevented access to the light-houses which are necessary to be maintained there. It has the approval of everybody.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I propose an amendment, to come in on page 10, line 22, after the word "park." I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no monuments or memorials shall be erected upon any lands of the park or remain upon any lands which may be purchased for the park, except upon ground actually occupied in the course of the battle by troops of the State which the proposed monuments are intended to commemorate, except upon those sections of the park set apart for memorials to troops which were engaged in the campaigns, but operated outside of the legal limits of the park; and the regulations of the commissioners of the park, as approved by the Secretary of War, promulgated December 14, 1895, are hereby affirmed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after line 12, page 13. After the amendment already adopted at that point I move to insert:

Award of Secretary of the Navy: For payment to the Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works its audited and adjusted claim for damages and losses incurred in the construction of the armored battle ship Texas, $80,049.35.

Mr. HALE. That is a large sum. Does the amendment come from any committee?

Mr. DANIEL. It is an estimate of the Secretary of the Navy of his award. I submitted it to the subcommittee which had charge of the pending bill. I am informed that there is no objection to the item, except as to the question whether it should go upon this bill or another. It has been examined carefully.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state that the committee did not consider that this was of such an urgent nature as to require its embodiment in the pending bill, but it considered that it was proper for the consideration of the next deficiency appropriation bill, which will not be very far off. Therefore, I can say to the Senator from Virginia that, it being a regularly audited claim, I have no doubt it will be incorporated in that bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether it has been passed upon by any committee of the Senate at the present session.

Mr. DANIEL. It has been examined by the members of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. It was reported to the subcommittee.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the members of the Committee on Appropriations indorse this one, that is one thing. If they do not, and no other committee of this body has passed upon so large a claim as it is, I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that it will be impossible to get it through. I received a letter this morning about this claim calling my attention to it, and whatever I may think of the merits of the proposition when it comes up for consideration I shall certainly object to its adoption until it has the sanction, the explicit sanction, of some committee of this body.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Virginia will withdraw it as an amendment to this bill——

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to make a brief statement on the subject.

Mr. HALE. He will then have an opportunity of getting what the Senator from New Hampshire suggests, the report of the committee in addition to what it has already done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Maine to make a point against the amendment?

Mr. HALE. I do not. I do not think I will need to do so.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to make a brief statement about the amendment I have proposed. This is a large sum, and it is all the more important that it should be paid to a plant which is engaged in active business and which has been delayed in its work for two or three years owing to the failure to receive money needed in current transactions. A denial of the prompt payment of a sum recognized to be due by the Government, which has been fully audited, is a species of repudiation which inflicts great hardship upon those who have to stand waiting for those funds which are necessary as a part of their capital to the successful operation of great business affairs.

The Richmond Locomotive and Machine Works is a comparatively new enterprise. It takes a vast amount of capital to establish a plant which can take a contract for such work as is needed in the construction of our ironclad ships; and in the commercial stringency which has existed for several years to be kept out of their money, as they have large transactions to keep up with, and when it is difficult to get accommodations to so large a degree in bank, is equivalent to putting a very serious impediment upon their success. If there were the slightest doubt as to the validity of this claim, if any thought were suggested which called in question any item of the claim, if there were anything to be examined that anyone seriously thought ought to be examined, I would think, of course, that opportunity should be given for that purpose, and I would not wish that in the slightest degree there should be undue haste or lack of scrutiny in passing upon it.

This is an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. This is an urgent claim, and it is of that kind which ought to be put on an urgent deficiency appropriation bill. Some deficiencies are of such a character that it makes no great difference whether the amount be paid to-day or to-morrow, but this is a matter which has arisen out of the action of the Government in delaying for nearly two years the work which had been contracted for by a plant which employed hundreds of workmen and which stood ready to execute its part of the contract.

This amendment was promptly referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, in addition to that, I took occasion to see each gentleman on the subcommittee who dealt with this matter, and I was informed by them that there was no objection to this claim. Here is the letter of the Secretary of the Navy. A year ago this matter was referred to him to consider and audit and report. He reported December 20, 1895. There has been no lack of opportunity for Congress, for its committees, for its subcommittees, to see the whole matter and to sift it to the bottom. They are perfectly satisfied about it, and the only question which, as it seems to me, is before the body is whether the Congress will delay the payment of this claim to some future day or pay it now.

The delay is a great hardship, I repeat, Mr. President, to a new plant established by large capital and not in a great money center like New York or Philadelphia, where large sums of money are constantly being handled and are accessible—but a new plant in the State of Virginia, where we have not the opportunities to command the capital which are so fully realized north of us. It seems to me, sir, that as he who gives quickly gives twice, he who pays quickly in this case pays twice, and he who does not pay quickly does not pay at all fairly. The company want this money; it is due, it is urgent, and the urgency of a citizen in his situation before a Government which recognizes that it owes the money is as much to be respected as any urgency in the Government itself. It is just as urgent as any claim in this bill, and I ask the Senate to adopt the amendment if it is satisfied that there is no objection to any of the items forming the gross amount proposed to be appropriated by it. I have laid this report upon the desks of Senators. I have called attention over and over again, as far as I could go without indelicately obtruding myself upon the attention of gentlemen who were much occupied, and I have yet to hear the first suggestion against any item of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The suggestion of the Senator from Virginia that this claim ought to pass now and here, because he gives twice who gives quickly, if literally acted upon in this body would wipe out not only the Committee on Appropriations, which has been subjected to some criticism, but every other committee of the body. All that would be necessary would be for the Senator interested in a claim to get a recommendation from the head of a Department and bring it here and move it upon any bill, and when asked, "Has this had the scrutiny of any committee of the body?" reply, "Not at all; the recommendation of the head of the Department has been printed and laid upon the desks of Senators. It is urgent; it ought to be paid, and he gives twice who gives quickly; let us pay it now."

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to state to the Senator from New Hampshire that this amendment has had the scrutiny of the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am coming to that. I am surprised that the Senator from Virginia, who is usually entirely right-minded upon all questions, both of fact and of manner of procedure, should think that this appropriation ought to be made upon the pending bill. As I understand it, this company made a contract with the Navy Department to construct marine engines.

Mr. HALE. For the Texas.

Mr. CHANDLER. The engines for the Texas.

Mr. DANIEL. The machinery and armament for the Texas.

Mr. CHANDLER. And the company has been paid, under the appropriation, every dollar of the original contract price. The Secretary has allowed extras; he has allowed sums for delay in the execution of the contract. So I infer from the letter I received this morning, and so I think Senators will find if they will look at the printed document, which I have not had time to examine. Now, the allowance of those extras, the allowance of these sums which impose an expense upon the United States for alleged delays on their part, hindering the Richmond company from performing their work, we are asked to make an appropriation for, without, I repeat, the claim having had the scrutiny of any committee of this body. The Senator says he showed it to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. If the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator will allow me to be accurate in the statement. The amendment was referred to the whole committee and by that committee, or its members, I was referred to the subcommittee, and it was specifically shown to each one of them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not doubt that any more than I doubt that the Senator has had the document carefully put upon the desks of Senators and has taken the pains to call it to the attention of Senators upon this floor. I know the Senator from Virginia would not undertake to have a measure of this kind passed without its being understood by the Senate, if he knew it. But, as a matter of fact, the amendment has not been examined by myself; it has not been examined by many Senators. I undertake to say that as a matter of fact it is not here with the indorsement and approval and recommendation of any committee of this body. If it is, then the Senator has the right to press it now. If it is not, then I am right. I am pleading only for due precaution and for the preservation of the rules and customs of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia ought not to press this claim upon the Senate at this time, even if it is in order, because it is not here with the report of any committee in favor of it. It is not here with the indorsement of any committee of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Virginia will, perhaps, do better if he withdraws the amendment, and the committee will consider it on the regular deficiency appropriation bill.

The reason why the committee did not give more examination to it in the present instance is because it determined that it would consider it in on that bill, and therefore it is true, as has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire, that the committee has not examined it, omitting to do so not in any spirit of hostility, but because it deemed it proper to come as an amendment on the regular deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I will accept the suggestion and withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have concluded not to move to reduce the appropriations in connection with the United States courts which were made by the House of Representatives. It is to be seen by looking at the amendments proposed by the Senate committee that in no case does the Senate committee increase the House appropriations for the current year. The amendments proposed by the Senate committee are for deficiencies of prior years in every case, and, as has been correctly said by the Senator from Maine, those appropriations are to meet the audited accounts for work done and expenditures incurred during past years. It is proper that those appropriations under the circumstances should be made.

The House of Representatives, in the exercise of their power and their judgment, have determined to make these enormous allowances to the Department of Justice for the work of the United States courts for the remainder of the present fiscal year. In accordance with the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, I bow to the judgment of the House. I hope the Senator from Maine is wrong when he says that after having appropriated $3,000,000 to begin with, and now having appropriated $3,000,000 more, carrying the expenditures up to $6,000,000 (when ten years ago there were only $3,000,000 appropriated), he thinks there will be additional deficiencies to be provided for at the end of the present fiscal year.

I think if there is any danger that there will be, it is the duty of the House and the Senate, it is the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, to set about framing a law that will put some limit upon these enormous and growing expenditures. If that can not be done the function of the Senate committee and of the House committee, of the Senate and of the House, is nothing; we might just as well make an indefinite appropriation for the expenditures of the United States courts, and say to the judges and the clerks, and the district attorneys and the marshals, and the commissioners and the bailiffs and the criers, "Spend as much money as you, in your good judgment, see fit to spend, and we will pay the bills." Mr. President, that is the existing condition practically, and no remedy is applied either by the regular committees of this body by changing the existing system or by the Committees on Appropriations of the two bodies or by the two bodies themselves.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, only a word. I hope that I shall be found mistaken in my forecasting about the extent of the deficiencies, but I am very much in fear that when this bill becomes a law, as it will not before the 1st of March, pretty much all the appropriations made in it will be covered by services and claims and bills up to that date, and that between now and the close of the present session we shall be called upon again for more money for this Department as the bills come in.

I agree with all that the Senator from New Hampshire has said about the necessity that something shall be done which will effectuate a remedy, and I am glad to know that the Committee on the Judiciary is considering this subject. I hope that committee will report some measure that we can pass so that we may try and see if we can not keep these expenses down. Then the Committees on Appropriations in the House and in the Senate ought to recommend what they believe to be ample appropriations for the entire year, so that if there are any deficiencies they shall be not nominal deficiencies, resulting from a failure to appropriate for the entire year, but actual deficiencies.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague upon the Committee on Finance, the chairman [Mr. MORRILL], is absent. He understands that after the deficiency appropriation bill should be acted upon the unfinished business would be the tariff bill. Was that the understanding? I should like to know.

Mr. TELLER. It was not mine.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. TELLER. I supposed we were to dispose of the three appropriation bills that were ready.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there has been no motion carried to proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Did he not give notice of a motion of that kind? I do not want to interfere with the appropriation bills, but at the same time I think that action should be taken upon the tariff bill one way or the other.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Florida will allow me a moment——

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me to make a statement, I will say to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Colorado that there was unanimous consent given that at the conclusion of the deficiency appropriation bill the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations relating to Cuba should be made the regular order. I ask that those resolutions be laid before the Senate as the regular order, and then we can give way to any appropriation bill that may be ready.

Mr. TELLER. I was not myself aware of any such understanding.

Mr. CALL. The RECORD will show it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] upon leaving the Chamber a few moments ago stated to me—I have had no opportunity to inform the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. SHERMAN. I was not in at that time.

Mr. ALLISON. He stated what he desired, that at the conclusion of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill the tariff bill should be made the regular order of procedure. He thought, at least he had reason to believe, that unanimous consent would be given for that purpose, and that then the tariff bill would be laid aside until all of the pending appropriation bills are disposed of. I hope it will be the sense of the Senate, without objection, to pursue that course.

Mr. CALL. The regular order of the Senate, by unanimous agreement, is the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. That agreement will be found in the RECORD. I ask for the reading of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will remember that the discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT. I should like——

Mr. CALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to inquire where that alleged unanimous agreement is to be found in the RECORD? Has the Senator the RECORD?

Mr. CALL. It was made two days ago. It is well known to Senators around me here. I ask the clerks to look up the RECORD of our proceedings two days ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure that I knew nothing about such an agreement.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly no one about me here has had any knowledge of it, or heard of it at the time.

Mr. ALLEN. Those resolutions were certainly made the special order.

Mr. CALL. There is no question about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. A special order is a different thing.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the RECORD be examined; and I call for the regular order.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Florida will gain nothing. Suppose that in accordance with a unanimous agreement taken at a time when few Senators were here the Senator succeeds in having the resolutions laid before the Senate in pursuance of that alleged agreement, the moment that that is done the Senator from Colorado will move to take up the appropriation bill and that will displace the Senator's resolutions, so that he will gain nothing whatever.

Mr. CALL. If the resolutions are laid before the Senate, I will give way at the request of the Senator without displacing the resolutions.

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether the Senate will give its consent to that course.

Mr. CALL. If the Senate does not give its consent, of course that ends it for the present. I think, however, the Senate should consent to do so, because the Senate gave that consent. It was formally asked for and formally given. I do not know how many Senators were present at the time, but there were quite a number.

Mr. TELLER. If that has been done, I certainly do not want to interfere with it.

Mr. CALL. That was done. There is no question about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the agreement may be read.

Mr. CALL. I can not find it in the RECORD, but there is no doubt about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the agreement, as stated in the RECORD.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the pending business, which I understand to be the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations relating to the war in Cuba and involving the question of belligerent rights and the recognition of the independence of the Cuban Republic may be taken up for consideration and be made the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. TELLER. That seems to settle the matter.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolutions be laid before the Senate, and then I will give way to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Colorado to withdraw his motion.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I give notice that I shall move to take up the tariff bill.

Mr. MORRILL entered the Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see the Senator from Vermont is now here, and I leave the matter with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In accordance with the unanimous agreement, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions referred to, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. Resolutions by Mr. MORGAN, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the deplorable war in Cuba.

Mr. CALL. Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. TELLER. I ask, unless the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] wishes to interpose, that the pending matter may be laid aside informally and the Military Academy appropriation bill be taken up.

Mr. MORRILL. I have been waiting for two days in order to move to take up House bill 2749. I gave notice that I would move to take it up yesterday. I have only waited until the disposition of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill to make the motion. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2749.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not make that motion. The tariff bill will probably provoke a discussion of many days here, and the resolutions which have been laid before the Senate can be disposed of one way or another without any great consumption of time.

Mr. MORRILL. I am here at some inconvenience to myself, and I ought to be at home. I shall not consent to any other business being interposed to prevent the consideration of the tariff bill if I can get a vote to that effect. I make the motion now to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senator from Vermont if he will not request that the vote be taken at a particular time without debate?

Mr. ALDRICH. Debate is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island demands the regular order. The question is on the motion to take up the bill the title of which has been stated.

Mr. CALL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. ALLEN responded.

Mr. BERRY. Do I understand the proposition is to take up the tariff bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is to proceed to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance, known as the tariff bill, upon which the yeas and nays are being taken.

Mr. CALL. I wish to state that if agreed to that would displace the regular order, which is the resolution in regard to the Cuban question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the calling of the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], but he authorized me to vote on the Cuban resolution, as I am personally interested in it. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I do not see him in his seat, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], and as he is not present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], which will enable the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and myself to vote.

Mr. BACON. Very well. Then my vote in the negative may stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under that arrangement I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I am paired generally with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] and vote "yea."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], who is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], to transfer that pair to the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON], who is absent, and the Senator from Michigan will then be at liberty to vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Under that arrangement I vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and I vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I inquire if the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has voted.

Mr. GEORGE. I have voted. I inquire if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] has voted? If he has not I will withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has not voted.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I will transfer the pair of my colleague to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], so as to enable the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] to vote.

Mr. SQUIRE. Under that arrangement I vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE. Then my vote in the negative may stand.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCBRIDE] is detained from the Senate by indisposition. If he were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHANDLER. The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] is paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. If present, the Senator from North Carolina would vote "yea" and the Senator from Louisiana "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). Since announcing the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], another transfer has been made that makes it necessary for me to withdraw my vote. I will therefore stand paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. HILL. Is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] recorded as voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is not recorded.

Mr. HILL. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and will vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that an arrangement has been made whereby the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] will stand paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], which will permit the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to vote.

Mr. CARTER. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. CHANDLER. I announce that I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] on political questions.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote, because the Senator from Utah [Mr. BROWN] has come into the Chamber since I transferred my pair to him, and I stand paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BROWN. I will vote upon this question, unless I have been paired in my absence. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. SEWELL] is paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. VILAS. I wish to add that my colleague [Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin] would vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE. I am permanently paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I propose transferring my pair with him to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], who is not paired, and who, I am informed, would vote "nay," if present. I vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest that the pairs be read.

Mr. GEORGE. Before that is done I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] if his colleague [Mr. MCBRIDE] has been sufficiently taken care of as to his pair?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He has been. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. If he were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE. It is my duty to take care of him.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to know how I am recorded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not recorded at all.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Nelson,	Sherman,

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TELLER. I now ask that the pending order may be informally laid aside, and that the Military Academy appropriation bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks that the business before the Senate be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted on as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and such is the order of the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask the Senator to yield to me to call from the table Senate joint resolution No. 73, in order that I may submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] desires to submit some remarks on the joint resolution to which he has referred; and, if I may be allowed, I yield to him for that purpose, with the understanding that the appropriation bill is merely laid aside informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the business before the Senate will be informally laid aside, and the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from South Dakota will be laid before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I send to the desk a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 additional copies of Senate Report 141, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, being the majority and minority reports of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations relating to hostilities in Cuba, with a copy of the substituted resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the resolution will have to go to the Committee on Printing unless the Senate orders otherwise.

Mr. MORGAN. The superintendent of the document room, who I suppose understands what the printing of such a document would cost, said that the resolution would not have to go to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be considered as before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have it read again.

Mr. MORGAN. It is merely to print 500 additional copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations made in regard to Cuba. The edition is exhausted, and the superintendent of the document room asked me to have the additional copies printed.

Mr. FRYE. What will it cost?

Mr. MORGAN. The superintendent says about $10.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to inquire of the Senator who introduced the resolution whether the report embraces the correspondence?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. PLATT. Has not that correspondence been submitted to Congress?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, and printed by the House of Representatives. I have an advance copy of it, but it is not quite complete. We shall have it to-morrow.

Mr. PLATT. We are going to be able to have it to-morrow morning?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

The resolution was agreed to.

UNION AND KANSAS PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I now ask that Senate joint resolution No. 73 may be laid before the Senate and read at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 73) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to foreclose the Government lien on the Union Pacific Railroad and the Kansas Pacific Railway, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to foreclose the Government lien upon the Union Pacific Railroad and the Kansas Pacific Railway, and pay the prior lien upon said roads, and take possession of the same for the Government of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall also pay the floating debt of said railroad companies, and take up the bonds and stock pledged as security therefor, and take possession of all branch lines that have been constructed in whole or in part out of the earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad. Said Secretary is also directed to take possession in the name of the Government of all the lands granted to said railroad and not conveyed to innocent third parties for a valuable consideration.

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to an amount sufficient for the object stated in this resolution, bearing not to exceed 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in coin, after five years from their date, and payable in ten years after their date. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to call the especial attention of the Committee on Pacific Railroads to this resolution, for I think it outlines a method by which to solve this much discussed question in a businesslike manner, and in the only way it can be solved with credit to the Government. We have only the interests of the whole people to consider. There are no equities in this case in favor of the present stockholders of these roads, and I will show that the reorganization committee of the stockholders of the roads are entitled to no consideration whatever, as they represent the heartless and unscrupulous scamps that have been robbing the Government and the public for a generation, casting reproach upon our Government and our people that must make every honest citizen blush with shame.

The stockholders and owners of the first-mortgage bonds on the Union and Kansas Pacific Railroad have appointed a committee to reorganize the road and to settle with the Government for its second mortgage upon the property. This reorganization committee proposes to issue one hundred million of fifty-year 4 per cent bonds on about 1,900 miles of road; that is, the road from Omaha to Ogden, which is the main line of the Union Pacific, and about 400 miles of road from Kansas City west, which is the Kansas Pacific Railroad. They also propose to issue seventy-five millions of preferred stock upon this 1,900 miles of road, and assess the present common stock of these companies, which amounts to $60,000,000, at 15 per cent, and thus raise $9,000,000. The preferred stock represents nothing. All of it but $20,000,000 goes to the manipulators of this proposed swindle. If this plan is carried out, then we will still as a Government be in partnership for fifty years with the same men who have been our partners for the past thirty years. As our partners in the past they have swindled us, stolen our property, bribed, debauched, and disgraced our servants, plundered the people along the line of road by extortionate rates, while at the same time by a system of rebates and discrimination they have enriched a favored few, and where these favored few were private persons they were men who it was supposed had influence in the community where they resided and could influence public opinion; but usually their favors were bestowed upon corporations engaged in trade whose stockholders were the officers and directors of these railroads.

We are now asked to continue this partnership, to continue to have relations with these same men, and upon what basis? Upon a basis of fraud; upon a plan by which this Government is to be a party to the issue of stock for which no consideration is paid, and upon which the public will be called upon to pay interest. There are 1,900 miles of road, one hundred millions of bonds, seventy-five millions of preferred stock, and sixty millions of common stock; in all, two hundred and thirty-five millions of bonds and stock, or $123,600 per mile.

This 1,900 miles of railroad can be reproduced for $23,600 per mile, and yet the Government of the United States is asked to go into partnership with a party of dishonest men and bond and stock the road for $123,600 per mile, and the public whom this road serves is to be called upon to pay interest on this vast sum. That any set of men could come to Congress with any such proposition as this and expect it to be ratified by the representatives of a free people is an impeachment of the integrity of the people of the United States. But these men have so learned the habit of making corrupt propositions to each other by which the public shall be plundered and robbed in the reorganization of overstocked companies of every sort that they do not hesitate to make the proposition now in open daylight to the American people, and it seems to me it is a matter for severe comment and censure that a committee of either body of the Congress of the United States can be found who will entertain it for one moment.

But they go further than this, and tell us how they will distribute this vast amount of stocks and bonds. They propose that the Government shall take $34,000,000 of the bonds, which is just equal to the principal of the Government's claim against the roads, and shall take $20,000,000 of the preferred stock in full payment for all the defaulting interest; that the first-mortgage bonds, which amount to $34,000,000, shall be taken up and a like number of these new bonds issued in their place; and for every $1,000 of bonds issued to the present holders of the first-mortgage bonds of these roads $500 of preferred stock shall be issued as a bonus, the remainder of the stock and the remainder of the bonds to be the property undoubtedly of the conspirators in this stupendous transaction.

Let us see who are the men who compose this reorganization committee of the Union and the Kansas Pacific railroads. This reorganization committee is composed of five members, Louis Fitzgerald, T. J. Coolidge, and Oliver Ames being three out of the five members of the reorganization committee (who represent the old management of the road, the Goulds of New York and the Ameses of Boston), the other two being Marvin Hughitt and Chauncey Depew. While every one of the receivers who are now managing and operating the road is in the interest of this gang of highwaymen who have plundered the public with this instrumentality in the past, three of the receivers, namely, S. H. H. Clark, who was formerly manager and for years president of the road, has been and is the representative of the Gould interest; Mr. Mink, of Boston, was comptroller of the company, and has been for years its vice-president, and is also an executor of the will of the late Fred L. Ames, and is, of course, the direct and immediate representative of the Boston crowd of highwaymen who, through the use of this highway, the Union and the Kansas Pacific railroads, have robbed the public and the Government for the past thirty years. The third receiver, who has always acted with this interest, is E. Ellery Anderson, who has also been for several years a Government director, and was placed there for the purpose of protecting the Government's interests, but has never undertaken to protect the Government's interests, but has always acted in the interest of the old and dishonest management. The other two receivers of the road, Coudert and Doane, seem to have a leaning in the same direction, for they have been Government directors, and have never remonstrated against the frauds which have disgraced the management of these roads and of which they must have had knowledge.

Mr. Anderson, one of these receivers and one of the Government directors of the road, stated to the Senate committee that the net earnings of this system of roads were, in 1894, $4,000,000, and in 1895 $5,000,000, yet they refused to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds and caused the default, evidently for the purpose of allowing the representatives of the first-mortgage bonds to foreclose their mortgage and take possession of the whole property. If receivers would manage private property in this manner almost any court in the land would insist upon their immediate removal; yet these men, with impudence and impunity, seem to have set out deliberately to assist the reorganization committee or the people they represent to carry out a conspiracy to swindle the Government out of its whole claim.

If this reorganization plan is carried through with the assistance of the Government the road will have to earn 4 per cent on $100,000,000 of bonds and 5 per cent, at least, on $75,000,000 of preferred stock, and the people along the line of the road will be charged a rate sufficient to accomplish this result, even if no dividend whatever is paid upon the $60,000,000 of common stock. This interest charged, then, will amount to $7,750,000 a year, which would be an unjustifiable burden upon the people who are served by the road. The only reasonable and proper thing for the Government of the United States to do is to take possession of the road, issue its own bonds bearing 3 per cent interest as provided by the resolution which I have offered, pay the first-mortgage bonds of $34,000,000, refund to the Government of the United States the $53,000,000 now due the Government from these companies, take up and pay the floating debt of these roads of $12,000,000, and thus get possession of the bonds and the stocks which are held as collateral security for this floating debt, and thus acquire title to $98,000,000 par value of the branch lines' bonds and stock, the market value of which is at least $42,000,000 at the present time, thus taking possession of all the branch lines of these roads, amounting to 4,000 miles of track, and operate the whole as one great system.

In this way the Government would realize every dollar these roads owe it. The interest charged would only be 3 per cent on $100,000,000 of bonds, or $3,000,000 per annum, instead of $7,750,000 under the plan proposed by the reorganization committee. The rates for carrying freight and passengers could therefore be much less. There would be no incentive for discrimination in favor of persons or places; every man and every town would have an equal opportunity, and the scandals of our Government connected with the Union Pacific management would disappear from the pages of our history.

I think it is well in this connection to call attention to the methods of the management of these roads in the past if we are going to determine whether we wish to continue that system of management in the future. In the past we have been simply creditors, but under the plan now proposed by these men we become parties not only to the issue of stock for which there is no consideration, but partners in a transaction the future of which will be described as the past has been described. I read from the report of the Union Pacific Railroad commissioners of 1888, by Robert E. Pattison, one of the commissioners, in which he says:

> The aided companies combined with others to tax the communities which they served, and they forced the consuming classes in all sections of the country to contribute to the payment of interest and dividend upon the fictitious capital which they had created. They increased the cost of living. They laid proprietary claim to the traffic of large sections of the country. They squandered millions of their money to "protect" their territorial claims, while expending other millions in encroachments upon the territory claimed by other companies. They constituted themselves the arbiters of trade. They attempted to dictate the channels that trade should follow and fixed rates of transportation that were extortionate. They charged all that the traffic would bear, and appropriated a share of the profits of every industry by charging the greater part of the difference between the actual cost of production and the price of the article in the market. They discriminated between individuals, between localities, and between articles. They favored particular individuals and companies. They destroyed possible competitors, and they built up particular localities to the injury of other localities, until matters had reached such a pass that no man dared engage in any business in which transportation largely entered without first soliciting and obtaining the permission of a railroad manager. They departed from their legitimate sphere as common carriers and engaged in mining articles for transportation over their own lines. They exerted a terrorism over merchants and over communities, thus interfering with the lawful pursuits of the people. They participated in election contests. By secret cuts and violent and rapid fluctuations in rates they menaced business, paralyzed capital, and retarded investment and development.

And yet they come and say that we should continue this partnership and become owners with them in the preferred stock, they having a majority of it, so that they can control its operations and continue this method of doing business.

Mr. GALLINGER. From what document has the Senator been reading?

Mr. PETTIGREW. From the minority report of Robert E. Pattison, of the United States Pacific Railway Commission.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if the Republican party is not directly responsible for this condition, it having been in control of the Government from the time of this report until 1893?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not care to furnish campaign material for the Populist party in Nebraska. The people of Nebraska may settle that question among themselves.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator decline to answer?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I have made all the answer I care to make to the Senator on that subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator another question. I infer from his remarks that he is in favor of the Government taking possession of this road. Is that correct?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Most certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. And owning it?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I can see no possible objection to the Government owning the road and operating it.

Mr. ALLEN. I then beg to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is paternalism and Populism, according to the Republican definition of those two words.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know whether or not that is the Republican definition of the two words. Perhaps it is the Populist definition.

I can see no objection to the Government owning the road and operating it. It seems to me that the railroad management of this country has been a total and complete failure. Our system of government is that every man shall have an equal, fair, untrammeled chance to do business, that the law of competition shall prevail. Yet in this respect not only these railroads but the railroads throughout this country have pursued a course that has hindered and prevented the exercise of the law of competition between individuals and between cities and towns. If the Government should own this road and operate it, how different would be the picture when peace and quiet prevailed, when fair and equal opportunity was bestowed upon all the people and all the towns along the line.

But if it is not thought best that the Government shall own the road and operate it, if it is not thought wise that we shall try the experiment and compare Government ownership, now when the opportunity is so easily offered, with private ownership, we should foreclose the mortgage and take possession of this property. There is no reason why we should not do it, even though the Government should afterwards conclude not to operate the road.

I appeal to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, who are considering this question, to dissolve forever this partnership with these corrupt manipulators, to refuse to deal or to have any further business relations with them whatever. If there is a strong prejudice against the Government ownership and operation of the roads, let us at least reorganize them upon an honest basis, upon a plan that will not disgrace us as a people; let us purge them of all association with the corrupt management of the past; and when this is once done there is no doubt but the roads can be sold and the Government realize every dollar it has invested in them. By so doing we would recover also several million acres of land which have not been patented to these companies and are still held by them. The plan which I propose would require the issue of $46,000,000 of 3 per cent Government bonds in addition to the present Government claim against these railroads, and with this $46,000,000 we would cancel the prior lien or mortgage upon the property; we would pay off the floating debt; we would secure title to $98,000,000 of bonds and stocks of branch lines, the market value of which is $42,000,000; we would secure, free from incumbrance, 1,900 miles of road, and also recover 7,000,000 acres of land, and, above all, we would have dissolved a partnership which has been a disgrace to the nation.

What individual would entertain for a moment a proposition to renew a partnership for fifty years with a man or a set of men who had for thirty years previous thereto been engaged in systematically plundering him, not only of the profits of the business but of all the interest upon his original investment, by the practice of almost every crime known to the law? And yet this is just what these men propose to the Government of the United States, and a committee of this body is seriously entertaining it, holding conferences day after day with these men, instead of pursuing the honorable, upright, and manly course so apparent to all. Not only ought we to take possession of these roads and reorganize them in the interest of the public and in the interest of public morality, but suits should be commenced against the estates of the original conspirators who are deceased, and against all the individuals who are living, to recover the money diverted to their own use fraudulently, and also to recover the $24,000,000 converted by them when the Kansas Pacific and Union Pacific were consolidated. These questions I will make the subject of another resolution.

Mr. President, I have not aimed to discuss this great question on this occasion, but to briefly outline a plan, which I hope the committee will at least consider, by which the people of the United States could at least escape disgrace in this connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senator from South Dakota in regard to the resolution?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have it referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from South Dakota addressed the Senate under a unanimous-consent agreement that applied only to himself.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not know there was a unanimous-consent agreement that applied simply to one Senator. I hope the joint resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOBILE HARBOR.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to ask unanimous consent of the Senate, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], to call up Senate joint resolution No. 54. It is a mere matter of detail with respect to carrying out a contract.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 54) authorizing the National Dredging Company to proceed with the work of dredging the channel of Mobile Harbor, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I merely desire to say that the joint resolution was unanimously reported by the Committee on Commerce after investigation.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES IN ARIZONA.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona. It is a short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State: And provided further, That all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of the public school fund of said Territory and shall not be used for any other than public school purposes.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lands reserved for university purposes, and all of the school lands in the Territory of Arizona reserved by law for school purposes, may be leased under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislature of said Territory, but until such legislative action the governor, secretary of the Territory, and superintendent of public instruction shall constitute a board for the leasing of said lands under the rules and regulations heretofore prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the respective purposes for which the said reservations were made, except that it shall not be necessary to submit said leases to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval; and all necessary expenses and costs incurred in the leasing, management, and protection of said lands and leases may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such leases: Provided, That no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State: And provided further, That all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of the public school fund of said Territory and shall not be used for any other than public school purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 1442) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota." The bill was suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, and after having been passed by the other House was considered and reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. If the bill does not lead to debate I shall not object to its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not an amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment from the committee.

Mr. NELSON. No; there is no amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I thought there was an amendment changing the name of one of the towns where advertisements were to be made.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC AGREEMENTS.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 146.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be stated, temporarily displacing the business before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. PEFFER, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to inform the Senate whether there has been a custom, rule, regulation, or agreement a long time existing among railroad companies and associations engaged in interstate traffic whose lines extend to or through Missouri River points, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it a Senate resolution or a concurrent resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a Senate resolution. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER January 27, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether there has been a custom, rule, regulation, or agreement a long time existing among railway companies and associations engaged in interstate traffic whose lines extend to or through Missouri River points, which custom, rule, regulation, or agreement establishes and maintains different rates of charges for carrying passengers and freight east and west from said points, and whether such difference in charges is reasonable and warranted by law.

Second. Whether such agreement affects alike companies running through lines to and beyond said Missouri River points, as well as companies whose lines terminate there, giving the names of roads engaged in interstate traffic to and through such places.

Third. Whether an agreement or traffic arrangement was recently made or entered into by and between any railway companies or associations, naming them, whereby charges for carrying grain and other farm produce from points in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory to points in Texas and Mexico were advanced; whether such advance charges are now in force; what was the reason or purpose of the advance, and whether it is reasonable or unreasonable and in violation of the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Fourth. Whether, in case these agreements have been made and these proceedings had, there is, in the opinion of the Commission, any additional legislation required to better protect the public interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BRICE. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent, without displacing the pending order, to take up for consideration——

Mr. PLATT. Did the Chair declare the result on the motion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call for a division on the question.

Mr. PLATT. The vote has not been declared on that motion, I understand.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was declared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair declared that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Connecticut ought to be allowed another vote, but it was certainly declared by the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. There was such confusion in the Chamber that certainly it was not heard here.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I call for a division.

Mr. BRICE. If there is any objection, I will withdraw the motion. I made it at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads. We are to have an important meeting of that committee to-morrow. If there is a desire to go on with the business of the Senate to-morrow I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the motion.

LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent, without displacing the pending order, to call up the bill (S. 824) to require patents to be issued to land actually settled under the act entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of Florida," approved August 4, 1842.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the bill read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That patents shall be issued to the persons in possession and occupation of all lands settled upon under the act entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of east Florida," approved on the 4th of August, A. D. 1842, where the land has been in the occupation and possession of the person who actually settled thereon, his widow, or heirs at law, or assigns, from whom a right of possession to said land under said act has been derived for the period of twenty years next preceding the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right and title of all persons embraced in the first section of this act is hereby confirmed to them, their heirs and assigns, to the 160 acres embraced in the original settlement under the said act of Congress.

SEC. 3. That proof of the possession and occupation of said land for the period of twenty years, and of the fact of application for settlement under the said act of Congress, shall be held to be conclusive as against the United States, of settlement under the said act of Congress, and of compliance with all the requirements of said act.

SEC. 4. That all persons claiming the benefit of this act shall be required to make the proof required herein within two years from the date of its approval, before the officers who are authorized to take similar proofs under the homestead laws; and the requirements of these laws as to notice, contests, appeals, and the course of procedure, shall, wherever they are applicable, apply to all cases arising under this act.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Quite a number of the members of the Committee on Public Lands are not present. That seems to be a very important bill, and I think it should go over.

Mr. CALL. Let me say to the Senator from North Dakota that the bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands by my colleague [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no doubt of that fact.

Mr. CALL. A similar bill was passed at the last session, and there is no kind of objection to it. There is not a person in the world who would object to it. It relates to——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to say a word. The bill relates to settlements that were made forty-five years ago under the armed occupation act. It simply provides that twenty years' continuous possession, as far back as the memory will go, shall be proof of the original settlement and occupation; that is all.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that Order of Business 190, being Senate resolution 81, which has been favorably reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, be taken up and agreed to.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, in making the inquiry concerning the prices of armor for naval vessels under the resolution of the Senate of December 31, 1895, be authorized to employ stenographers and to send for persons and papers, and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid upon proper vouchers from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SPRAGUE, WASH.

Mr. MANTLE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Select Committee on National Banks with an amendment, in section 1, line 11, after the words "Provided, That," to insert:

Said bank increase its capital to $100,000, so as to conform to the requirements of the law regulating national banks, and that it send.

So as to make the section read:

That the First National Bank of Sprague, now located at Sprague, Lincoln County, State of Washington, is hereby authorized to change its location or place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on to the city of Spokane, Spokane County, State of Washington, by and with the consent of the Comptroller of the Currency, whenever the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock of said bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, determine to make such change: Provided, That said bank increase its capital to $100,000, so as to conform to the requirements of the law regulating national banks, and that it send a duly authenticated notice of said vote and of the new location shall be sent to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; but the change of location shall not be valid until the Comptroller of the Currency shall have issued his certificate of approval of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WHARF AT SITKA, ALASKA.

Mr. PERKINS. With the consent of the Senator from Colorado, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1693) for the rebuilding or repair of the public wharf at Sitka, Alaska.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object, for I see I shall not be able to do anything to-night with the appropriation bill I have in charge. I understand that there is a desire to have an executive session in a few moments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORIENTAL MANUFACTURES.

Mr. QUAY. I ask unanimous consent, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado, to offer a resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire respecting the alleged invasion of our markets and the menace offered to American manufacturing industry by the products of cheap Oriental labor, and to determine what is the cause of this menace and what means should be adopted to avert the threatened injury to domestic producers.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. I have stricken out at the end of the resolution the ordinary and what may be the necessary clause for the employment of a stenographer and the authority to send for persons and papers, leaving that to the Committee on Finance to ask for it if it thinks proper. In support of the resolution, and in explanation of it, I send to the desk and ask to have read the proceedings of the National Association of the Manufacturers of the United States in convention in Chicago on the 22d of last January.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the paper be printed as a separate document.

Mr. QUAY. I should like to have it go in the RECORD with the resolution. I think the proceedings are important and will interest the Senator from Missouri as well as other Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania ask that the paper be read or that it go in the RECORD?

Mr. QUAY. Let it go in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The paper referred to is as follows:

At the meeting of the National Association of the Manufacturers of the United States held in Chicago last week, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas intimations have been given in the public press of an extraordinary recent development of manufacturing industry in Eastern countries, particularly in Japan, and of the appearance in the American market of the products of this industry, which products are offered at unusually low prices:

"Be it resolved, That the president of this association appoint a committee of three to inquire respecting the matter and to report to-morrow to the convention what action, if any, should be taken by the association with reference to the alleged menace to American manufactures."

The committee the next day made the following report:

"REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ORIENTAL MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY.

"The committee appointed to inquire respecting the development of manufacturing industry in the far East, and particularly in Japan, desires to make the following report:

The movement for the establishment of manufactures in the countries referred to is of a remarkable character. It began within the last ten or fifteen years, and it has continued with accelerated force until the present time.

In 1863 the first cotton spinning mill was erected in Japan, with 5,456 spindles. The business did not at first show signs of rapid growth; but in 1883 there were 16 mills, with 43,700 spindles. In the report of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce for May 5, 1894, the following statistics were given:

At the end of 1883 there were 16 mills, with 43,700 spindles.
At the end of 1888 there were 24 mills, with 88,140 spindles.
At the end of 1892 there were 39 mills, with 403,314 spindles.
At the end of 1893 there were 46 mills, with about 600,000 spindles.

The same report adds; as still more rapid increase is expected in the near future, large orders, it is known, have been placed for more machinery, some for yarns of the finer qualities.

This promise of increase has been fulfilled. New cotton mills are being erected, and Japan threatens to become a bold and large competitor for the trade of the world in cotton fabrics. The Japanese use the latest improved American and European machinery in this and other industries established by them. They begin with mechanical appliances that are superior to those found in some American mills. But Japan does not confine herself to spinning cotton. Her people are introducing a great variety of manufacturing industries, all using improved machinery, and they are imitating the patterns and inventions of the Western nations with impunity, because there is no protection for either the patents or trade-marks of foreigners in Japan.

Recently the French consul at Yokohama, Mr. Klobukowski, reported to his Government as follows:

"There is no country in the extreme East which will not be invaded by goods made in Japan in imitation of European wares. Some of them are still inferior in quality; the greater number, thanks to modern machinery, are quite equal to ours. Both are of a cheapness which the high price of our labor will never permit us to attain. Then, again, our trade-marks are unprotected in Japan. The natives have only to imitate or copy your articles without necessarily acknowledging their obligation. Their amour propre does not brook the accusation of being mere imitators; they introduce, therefore, some trifling alteration in our machinery, and thereupon, with an easy conscience, take out themselves a fresh patent in their own country."

In confirmation of this report of the wide diversity of the new Japanese industries Sir Ernest Sutow, the British representative at Tokyo, in a report to his Government, says:

"The most marked advance is, however, shown (by the Japanese) in 'manufactured products,' the value of the export of which in the first half of 1895 exceeds that of the corresponding period of 1894 by no less than $8,592,860. Matches, floor matting, straw plaits, cotton carpets, cotton yarn, and silk handkerchiefs, all show very considerable advances, while the export of silk piece goods has more than doubled itself, the value having increased from a little over $3,000,000 to nearly $8,500,000. The list of imitations of European articles now made in Japan is a long one, and is steadily increasing. Among those shown at the Domestic Industrial Exhibition, held this year at Kioto, were blankets, carriage rugs, shawls, shirts, cotton and silk socks, cotton towels, felt and straw hats, boots, saddles, harness, portmanteaus, clocks, thermometers, harmoniums, optical, musical, surveying, and surgical instruments, photographic cameras, woolen flannel, and cloth, lead and slate pencils, and a host of others. In fact, it may be safely said that there is nothing of common use produced in Europe which can not now be imitated with more or less success in Japan."

A correspondent in Japan of the London Times, referring to the wonderful sudden development of manufacturing industry in those islands, mentions that the Japanese are now producing felt hats, upon American and European patterns, of the best quality. He says that we may buy at retail in Japan for 87 cents a hard or soft felt hat which in London would sell at retail for $2.62 and probably in this country for $3. The Japanese also are beginning to make boots and shoes for export with improved modern machinery. Before long the American shoe that is sold for $3 at retail is likely to have a rival from Japan which will be offered, probably, for about 75 cents. The correspondent referred to reports that highly skilled Japanese workmen employed in producing such articles earn about 81 cents a week, or, say, one-third as much in seven days as a fairly good American workman now earns in one day.

In an article upon this subject under date of October 28, 1895, the London Times said:

"Meanwhile Japan has determined to supply her own wants. It is stated that only one-fourth of her requirements are now imported, as against 67 per cent six years ago. Even more striking is her determination to get rid of European help in the actual work of production. 'Since the date, now four years ago,' says the Bombay Gazette, 'when the foreign mill managers all received notice on one day that their services would no longer be required after the expiry of the notice, not a single man of Western birth has been engaged in the cotton mills, and the half million odd spindles at work are entirely under indigenous direction. There are 2,100 miles of railway open and 400 miles more under construction, but the only foreign assistance in their working is that of a solitary Scotchman, whose ties to the country have been strengthened by his marrying a Japanese girl." Even in the arsenals, with their rapid turn-out of arms of precision, only two or three Europeans now remain. The coasting trade has passed entirely into the hands of Japanese shippers and engineers. A similar process is going on throughout the whole merchant navy of Japan, and is only retarded by the expediency of having captains and chief engineers who hold English certificates, with a view to securing favorable insurance rates. But at any moment the Japanese Government may organize a system of marine insurance which will oust the British employees from this last foothold in Japanese enterprise. The results already attained justify Sir Alfred Lyall's forecast of the new era when the industrial inventions by which Europe has hitherto prevailed over Asia will be turned against their inventors."

The Times further said:

"Japan is trying to capture the markets of the far East. The new treaties which recognized her equality with the Western trading countries as a civilized mercantile power, her establishment of a consul-general at Bombay, the creation of steamer lines which shall defy Western competition by the aid of State subsidies, the dismissal of foreign employees in her factories, arsenals, and railway workshops, and the development of her mill and engineering productions on an enormous scale, form the industrial side of that long-prepared advance of which the military aspects recently startled Europe. As European statesmen are now compelled to recognize in Japan a predominant factor in Eastern politics, so British capitalists and Indian mill owners are being forced to acknowledge her successes in the great commercial struggle of the nations."

Are the products of the Japanese factories to be sold only in Eastern markets? By no means. They are already appearing in the markets of the United States. In a letter dated November 30, 1895, Mr. M. Benker, editor of the San Francisco Daily Report, said:

"Articles of Japanese manufacture since the close of their war are being received of equal quality with American manufactured goods, and at prices so low that our manufactories of these articles must close unless relieved by Congressional action. Report stated that H. E. Reynell, of Kobe, Japan, established an agency in San Francisco, in the Crocker Building, Mr. Edward O. Burns being their agent, for the sale of Japanese manufactured goods for the purpose of underselling American products. Similar agencies are being established East and West now by representatives of Japanese houses. The agency here is now selling the best parlor matches in tin-lined box, in box and case lots of 50 gross in a case, delivered to the merchant freight and duty paid, at 30 cents per gross. He also sells doors, sashes, blinds, and all articles of wooden ware, cooperage stock, etc., of Japanese manufacture at from 30 to 50 per cent less than they can be manufactured for in this country, with all freight and duty paid by the Japanese importers; also clocks, watches, bicycles, boots, shoes, clothing, hats, caps, gloves, fancy goods, and notions on similar terms. Their agents are buying cotton-mill machinery and shipping to Japan, and will take our cotton from here to Japan and send it back manufactured for less than it can possibly be manufactured in this country.

They also take cargoes of Pacific Coast lumber, manufacture the same in Japan into wooden ware, etc., and return same here manufactured at 50 per cent less than our manufacturers' wholesale prices."

Articles of Japanese manufacture have appeared in our Eastern cities, rivaling and underselling American articles suitable for similar purposes. Japanese matting is now crowding out cheaper kinds of Philadelphia carpets. Japanese rugs made in imitation of American patterns are sold in great quantities in preference of American rugs of higher value. Brushes are sold at retail in Eastern cities for about the American value of the manufactured bristles. American watch-case makers are selling to Japan cases for excellent movements made there for this market.

There can be no concealment of the fact that some of our manufacturing industries are gravely menaced by this rivalry of a country where skilled labor may be had at a cost of 10 or 15 cents a day, or less than one-tenth of the cost of such labor in our own country.

Your committee does not care to discuss the causes of this menace or the methods by which the peril may be averted. We believe that the National Association should, however, take cognizance of the matter and should ask that Congress shall investigate the subject in a thorough and comprehensive manner, so that the people may fully understand it. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved by the National Association of American Manufacturers in convention assembled in Chicago January 22, 1896, That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to appoint a commission, or to direct one of its own committees, to inquire respecting the alleged invasion of our markets and the menace offered to American manufacturing industry by the products of cheap Oriental labor, and to determine what is the cause of this menace and what means should be adopted to avert the threatened injury to domestic producers."

The resolution was unanimously adopted, and the following persons were appointed a committee to bring the matter to the attention of Congress: Robert Dornan, president, and Charles Heber Clark, secretary, of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to have a little bill passed. It will take only a moment.

Mr. VILAS. Certainly. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the motion.

WILLIAM MORGAN AND HARRISON MOORE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1320) to confirm the title to certain lands in William Morgan and Harrison Moore and to require the issue of patents therefor. It has been favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands and is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. GORMAN, the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m) adjourned, the adjournment being until Monday, February 17, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 13, 1896.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

J. Kearney Rice, of New Jersey, to be attorney of the United States for the district of New Jersey.

PROMOTIONS IN THE REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

First Lieut. George H. Gooding, of Virginia, to be a captain in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

Second Lieut. Daniel J. Ainsworth, of Virginia, to be a first lieutenant in the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Daniel W. Andrew, of Massachusetts, to be collector of customs for the district of Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts.

John H. Brocklesby, of Connecticut, to be collector of customs for the district of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut.

POSTMASTERS.

Selden B. Palm, to be postmaster at Warren, in the county of Trumbull and State of Ohio.

J. L. Fulcher, to be postmaster at Waynesboro, in the county of Burke and State of Georgia.

John N. Leithold, to be postmaster at Postville, in the county of Allamakee and State of Iowa.

William A. Wagoner, to be postmaster at Sabetha, in the county of Nemaha and State of Kansas.

F. M. Ranck, to be postmaster at Westerville, in the county of Franklin and State of Ohio.

Sarah A. Bachman, to be postmaster at Slatington, in the county of Lehigh and State of Pennsylvania.

Reuben R. Freeman, to be postmaster at Chillicothe, in the county of Ross and State of Ohio.

Edmund W. Nutter, to be postmaster at East Bridgewater, in the county of Plymouth and State of Massachusetts.

Samuel B. Wheeler, to be postmaster at Westport, in the county of Fairfield and State of Connecticut.

Thomas P. McAndrews, to be postmaster at White Haven, in the county of Luzerne and State of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

(Continuation of legislative day of February 12, 1896.)

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 10.30 a. m., Thursday, February 13, 1896, by the Speaker.

[Mr. DOOLITTLE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. GROUT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I fear I have nothing new or novel to offer in the discussion of this measure. If the quality of the speeches already made is in keeping with the quantity, I am sure no new fields of argument is left unexplored. It is not my purpose to descant upon the science of wealth or to theorize upon the relative value of gold and silver. It is a condition and not a theory that confronts us, and I hope to confine myself to a practical discussion of the subject before us.

I will hasten to correct the impression in some quarters that all those who recently voted against the bond bill when it was pending in the House are advocates of the unlimited coinage of silver.

When the bond bill was pending before this House in December last I saw proper to cast my vote against it, for reasons satisfactory to myself and which it is not now necessary to state.

The pending measure comes to the House from the Senate in the form of a substitute for that bond bill, and we are asked to support a proposition for the free and unlimited coinage of silver independent of all other nations of the earth. This proposition, in the shape it comes to us, I can not consent to support. I am not one of those who attribute the unprecedented hard times and the panicky condition of the country for the past three years to what is so frequently miscalled the demonetization of silver in 1873. The act of 1873 did not demonetize silver. It only changed the unit of value from silver to gold, and by subsequent legislation by the Republican party silver was infinitely more used as money than was the case from the foundation of the Government down to 1873, the time it is alleged that the white metal was robbed of its money power. In point of fact, during the eighty years of the existence of this Government down to 1877 the Democratic party had been in control more than three-fourths of the period, and during all this time there were coined only a little more than eight million of silver dollars, and, in addition, the subsidiary silver coin. On the other hand, from 1877 to October, 1893, there were coined more than 400,000,000 silver dollars, or their equivalent was put into circulation in the shape of silver certificates and Sherman notes.

At the date the Democratic party returned to power, March 4, 1893, there were being added to the circulating medium of the country about 50,000,000 silver dollars annually; and let it be remembered that the very first legislation enacted by our Democratic friends was the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, thereby discontinuing the further use of silver for coinage purposes, excepting in subsidiary coins.

The Democratic party in their Chicago platform of 1892 had declared the Sherman law a "cowardly makeshift," and demanded its repeal. These are indisputable facts, and I challenge their successful contradiction.

Now I come to the question, Are the present conditions of the country, and as they have existed since March, 1893, attributable to the legislation of 1873 changing the unit of value from silver to gold? Without hesitation I answer, no.

Mr. Speaker, I beg to call the attention of the House to the condition of the country after thirty-two years of Republican administration from the day Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated in 1860 up to March 4, 1893, the day Mr. Harrison's Administration closed.

During this period the wealth of this nation increased from $16,000,000,000 to more than $62,000,000,000, a sum so vast that the human mind is utterly incapable of its comprehension—an increase of 400 per cent. Such prosperity is unparalleled in the history of the world. Our railroad mileage increased from 30,000 miles to more than 100,000 miles. The South produced only 90,000 tons of pig iron in 1868, and in 1892 the production increased to more than 1,000,900,000 tons. In 1870 the South spun 100,000 bales of cotton, and in 1892 more than 800,000 bales. And thus I might go on, but these serve to demonstrate the proposition that the period from 1860 to 1893 was the most prosperous in the history of this great country, and the last year of this period was the most prosperous known in business in the history of this country, if R. G. Dun & Co.'s Review of Trades is to be credited.

Thus we were going steadily forward from prosperity to greater prosperity as each succeeding year passed by when the country was overtaken by a Democratic simoom of free-trade wild-cat money and an insatiable thirst for office. Note the change! And what a change it was.

From 1892, the most prosperous in the history of the nation, we are driven headlong into disaster after disaster, and in the language of Dun's Trade Review:

> Starting with the largest trade ever known, mills crowded with work, and all business stimulated with high hopes, the year 1893 has proved, in sudden shrinkage of trade, in commercial disaster, the worst in fifty years. The year closes with prices of money product the lowest ever known, with millions of workers seeking in vain for work, and with charity laboring to keep back suffering and starvation in all our cities.

What! The last year of Republican rule the most prosperous ever known and the first year of Democratic rule the worst for fifty years! This is a sad story for our Democratic friends, and sadder yet for the country; but it is true.

The American Economist of October 12 publishes a most startling condition of affairs for 1894. It is a table giving the number of hands employed for the first six months of 1892 and for a like period in 1894, together with the wages paid and output. Note the result. The number of hands employed from January 1 to June 30, 1892, decreased 30 per cent for a like period in 1894. The amount of wages paid decreased 45 per cent. The average earnings per hand in 1892 were $250, while in 1894 they were only $195. To cure all these ills that they have brought upon the country our Democratic friends now offer us the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

In 1893 they proclaimed that the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law would stop the then pending panic and save the country from the unparalleled disaster into which it was rapidly being driven by the threat of the Democratic party to place the country on a free-trade basis, coupled with the power to execute this most unfortunate and un-American doctrine. The repeal of the Sherman law brought no relief, nor did it stay the oncoming of the expected crash in the business world, with all the ills that that word implies. I assert that the repeal of this law was absolutely barren of any good results to the country. But, on the other hand, it stopped the coinage of more that fifty millions of silver dollars per year and prevents that sum being annually added to the volume of our currency.

If I understand the object to be attained by the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the United States, it is to increase the volume of ultimate money. That this would not be the effect beyond the amount of silver coined from the silver product of the mines of the United States seems to me to be too plain to admit of an argument. And I assert that the volume of the currency of the United States would not be increased 1 farthing by the free and unlimited coinage of silver beyond the amount of silver coined from the mines of these United States.

The free coinage of silver means coinage on the private account of the owner of the bullion and without cost of mintage. This being true, the owner of silver bullion, whether he is a citizen of this country or of Europe, Asia, or Africa, South America, or Mexico, or of whatever country, would be at liberty to bring his silver bullion to our mints, owned and operated by this Government, at the expense of the taxpayers of this country, and have it coined into silver dollars. It was the property of the individual before coinage and it is his afterwards, to do with as he wishes. He may choose, if an alien to this Government, to take it with him to his own country. He may choose to exchange it for our greenbacks, gold or silver certificates, or for gold, and then he would remove it from the country, and, in point of fact, this Government would not realize 1 farthing from this transaction in the way of increase in the volume of our money or otherwise, while we would be out the expense incident to its coinage, and charged with the burden of maintaining it on a parity with gold.

On the other hand, every dollar coined from silver owned and produced by the citizens of the United States would remain here, go into circulation, and thus augment the volume of the currency.

Silver is one of the money metals of the Constitution, and I believe it is the duty of the country to utilize every dollar of it possible as such that is consistent with sound money and sound credit.

And I ask leave to print the accompanying table, based upon the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the products of silver of the world and of the United States, and the coinage thereof, from 1864 to 1893.

All figures are based upon official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

a No reliable data as to the world's coinage could be secured for years previous to 1874. The amount of silver recoined each year was subtracted from the total coinage to give the figures of this column.

b Includes both silver dollars and fractional silver.

c There was no silver in circulation after 1862 until 1876, except a small amount on the Pacific Coast. The figures given include silver dollars and subsidiary silver.

d Includes silver bullion to the (coinage) value of $181,996,498 purchased by the United States under the act of July 14, 1890, but still uncoined. This comprises $15,747,969 in 1890, $53,763,133 in 1891, $63,652,668 in 1892, and $48,832,728 to November 1, 1893, when the purchasing clause was repealed.

From the history of this country I am convinced that all the silver produced by the mines of the United States that is not used in the arts and sciences can be safely coined into dollars or used as money without impairing our credit or disturbing the parity of gold and silver. In other words, I believe that this country can maintain the parity of gold and silver with the free coinage of silver limited to the product of the United States. And hence, Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read for information, an amendment which I propose to offer to the first section of the pending bill at the proper time.

Insert at the close of section 1, in line 13, page 3, after the words "now provided by law," the following:

Provided, however, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only, and that a duty be imposed on all silver that may be imported into the United States, whether in bullion or in other forms, including ores containing silver in quantities sufficient to make them valuable for smelting for the silver therein contained, at a rate equal to the difference between the commercial and coinage value of silver on the day of entry.

I have already said that I was not one of those who attributed the hard times and the panicky condition of the country to the financial legislation of 1873, nor do I believe the depleted condition of the Treasury can be justly charged to that legislation. But, in my opinion, the Treasury has been depleted and the Government compelled to borrow money by the sale of bonds for the first time since the war because of the threat of the Democratic party to place the Government on a free-trade basis, and their attempt to carry into execution their declared purpose by the enactment of the Gorman-Wilson tariff law, with the result that the revenues raised thereunder are inadequate to meet the current expenses of the Government. Our imports have largely increased and our exports decreased, or, in other words, we have been buying from abroad largely more than we sold abroad, and this balance of trade against us had to be paid in gold. Whereas, under the Republican tariff law, we sold largely more than we purchased abroad, and the balance of trade was with us and foreign countries paid to this Government this balance in gold, and hence there was but small demand upon the Treasury for gold to ship abroad.

From 1865 to 1893 there was never a year when the revenues of the Government were not more than its expenses. At the close of the last Republican Administration there were $124,000,000 in the Treasury, and since that time there has not been a month that our expenses have not been more than $2,000,000 in excess of our income.

During the four years of the Harrison Administration we not only raised enough revenues to meet current expenses, but there was paid during these four years $296,000,000 of the principal and interest of our bonded indebtedness, retiring about two hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds. Since March 4, 1893, the Democratic Administration has fallen behind more than $2,000,000 each month; it has not paid off one bond, but, on the other hand, this Democratic Administration has sold $262,000,000 in bonds to get money to pay our current expenses.

So we see that when the revenues of the Government are equal to or in excess of its expenditures there is no deficiency in the Treasury and no bonds sold; but when the revenues are below the expenditures, then there is a deficiency, and enormous sums of bonds are sold to meet this deficiency. Hence, it is clear to my mind that the financial legislation of 1873 did not produce the present approximately empty Treasury.

Let our revenues be increased so as to meet our expenses, and the Treasury will not be depleted again, and no more sales of bonds will be indulged in for the people to pay who are to follow us.

Mr. Speaker, I am intensely American. I believe in the American people. I believe in America for Americans. I believe in our flag, our money, our mines, our manufactures, our workshops, our furnaces, our farms, and our wage earners. I believe in bimetallism, the use of both gold and silver as money; that every dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, should be as good as every other dollar in the pockets of every man who may chance to hold it. This is the doctrine of the Republican party. We had a prosperous country, growing in wealth and in population and in business. Our currency should be a constantly increasing one, keeping pace with our constantly increasing population and commerce. I believe our per capita should be constantly and gradually increased, not by unwise inflation, until it shall be $40 per capita; but let this increase be made with an eye single to its soundness and to the necessities of the country.

Let us return to the doctrine of protection, and at the same time to the doctrine of the use of the silver of the United States as money, which will come with the incoming Republican Administration, and the people will again be prosperous and contented. Commerce and manufacture will again wear an air of prosperity, and the country will resume the march to the achievement of greater and nobler things.

The amendment which I propose is neither gold nor silver monometallism, but it is bimetallism. This policy would enable this Government to take care of her own silver in her own way without undertaking to take care of the silver of nations that refuse to take care of it for themselves. This policy could be continued until such time as would prove its wisdom, or until other nations should care to join with us, and thus broaden the use of the white metal by international agreement. We can not regulate the money of the world, but we can and ought to regulate our own; and in my humble judgment this country will settle this question for herself on the lines indicated in the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, this discussion is being carried on with no hope of an immediate solution of the problem before us. We all know that there is not the slightest possibility of this bill becoming a law. This fact was well known at the time it was under discussion in the other branch of Congress, and yet it injuriously affects the business interests of the United States. The fact that there is a considerable sentiment among the people and their representatives in Congress in favor of so radical a change in the financial system of this country as is proposed by the pending measure is sufficient in itself to alarm those who believe that its adoption would be disastrous. We all know that business is based to a great extent on confidence in the stability of things and that both business and capital are timid. If a storm threatens, they get to cover as far as they are able: if a new system of finance is introduced or radical changes are proposed in the old one, they await developments. They want to know what is going to be done, and then they are extremely cautious until it is ascertained by actual experience what effect the changes will have.

But the threat of such legislation in its influence upon the business of the country is as nothing in comparison with the effect that its consummation would have. It is the most radical of measures and goes to the foundation of our present financial system. No middle ground is taken by its advocates; no position of conservatism looking to a more general use of the white metal as a part of our monetary system is satisfactory to those who are urging the passage of this bill. With protestations that they are in favor of bimetallism, they are advocating the passage of a measure which in my humble judgment will force upon this country silver monometallism. I am not among those who can see nothing but weakness in our present system. I believe that if we could get rid of the financial doctors who are constantly insisting that the Government is sick, each one of whom is trying to dose it with his particular nostrum, we would be largely relieved of the present difficulties. If the healthiest gentleman in this House were to be accosted on the way to the Capitol by a dozen of his friends, each of whom with solemn face would tell him how very badly he looked and ask him if he were not sick, there are ten chances to one that before night he would go to bed and send for a physician. Do you wonder that the Government is sick financially, when the country is full of people who are declaring it is on the verge of bankruptcy? There comes from the distinguished gentleman who presides at the other end of the Avenue the charge that all of our financial woes are the result of our system of finance, and he urges the immediate retirement of the greenbacks and the substitution of interest-bearing bonds for that part of our circulating medium. He further contends that our policy with reference to silver has added largely to our misfortunes and heaped difficulty upon difficulty. On the other hand, there comes from the other end of the Capitol the charge that financial ruin is staring us in the face and that free silver is what we need, and they propose to give us more of that which the President says is like a stone about our neck.

As was said by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who opened this debate, this House sent to the other branch of Congress a bill intended to relieve the present embarrassment of the Treasury, an embarrassment which, in my opinion, has been wholly caused by the assaults that have been made, first, upon the industrial system inaugurated by the Republican party, and, secondly, upon the credit of the country. To this bill, framed in response to what seemed an urgent demand for relief, there comes back to this House the reply that as a remedy we shall open our mints to the silver of the whole world at a ratio of 16 to 1. The country is suffering, says the President, from too much silver; then, say the financial doctors at the other end of the Capitol, we will give it more, evidently upon the principle that like cures like, showing that they belong to the homeopathic school of finance. I am more than amazed at the financial vitality of this nation, in view of all the circumstances.

And what is the proposition contained in this bill? It is to throw open the doors of our mints and extend an invitation to the people of the world to bring their silver here and have it coined into dollars at a ratio of 16 parts of silver to 1 of gold. It starts out by absolutely ignoring the commercial value of these two metals. I do not recall a single instance in the history of any nation where the ratio between these two metals has been fixed without taking into consideration their commercial value. Their commercial value was not always, at the time the ratio was fixed, precisely equal to their coin value, but approximately so. But now the silver in the silver dollar is worth, commercially, only a little more than one-half the value of the gold in the gold dollar. It is proposed by this bill to legislate nearly 50 cents into the silver dollar by putting the Government stamp upon it and by saying that it shall be a legal tender for all debts, public and private. To that extent it is pure fiatism.

There is no doubt but that it can by this process be given this additional debt-paying power. The Government would likewise have the power to say that 100 grains of pure silver shall constitute a dollar and be receivable for all debts, public and private, and yet there is probably no one who would advocate such a proposition. And yet why not? If the Government can make a dollar out of 50 cents' worth of silver and can maintain that dollar at a parity with gold and have them circulate concurrently, why may it not do the same with 25 cents' worth of silver? As the advocates of the free coinage of silver have not been deterred by the fact that silver has fallen about one-half in value, there is no reason to suppose that they would cease their demand for this measure if it should further decline. In fact, the history of this movement shows that the cheaper silver gets the more persistent are they in favor of its free coinage by this country, independent of any other, at the ratio of 16 to 1.

But the payment of debts is not the only purpose for which it is used. It is also used as a medium of exchange, and every time it is depreciated in value its exchange power is decreased. While you are making it easier to pay debts that have already been contracted upon a different basis, you are cutting down the purchasing power of the money. While you are increasing the price of things that people have to sell, you are at the same time increasing the price of those they have to buy. I suppose that a measure which would enable everyone to get a high price for what he had to sell, and to get what he had to buy at a low price, would be a very popular measure; but it is hardly possible that statesmanship will ever be able to devise such a one. Nor will the depreciation of the dollar add anything to values. Legislation does not create values. They depend upon the cost of production and the supply and demand. Nothing whatever was added to the values in this country during the war by the depreciated paper currency we had then. Prices were raised because everything was measured by a depreciated standard, but nothing was added to the value of the wheat or corn or labor by that kind of currency.

An act of this Congress can add nothing to the wealth of the country. Its wealth is in what it has produced and in its means for further production. You may change the standard by which that wealth is measured, but you can not increase it. Gentlemen talk about doubling values by doubling the money of the country, but in doing so they confound prices with values. There may be a wide distinction between them. Prices mean the value expressed in the accepted standard of measurement and change as that standard is changed, but real values are governed by the cost of production and the supply and demand. Prices rise when money is cheap, because people will not part with their property for cheap money as readily as when it has a larger purchasing power. In the South during the war property, as measured by the Confederate money, rose to enormous prices, but who would contend that the wealth was increased thereby? If it had been the people of the South would have been richer than any other people in the world. You might make a man 12 feet high by changing the standard foot from 12 to 6 inches, but in doing so you would not add one cubit to his stature.

The money of the country is no fair index to its wealth. It is an ipsignificant proportion of that wealth, indeed it may be a charge against that wealth, as in the case of credit money. The man who looks only to the circulating medium of the country to ascertain the basis of its prosperity does not look deep enough. Back of that and below that, in the rich lands and their productions, in the manufactories and their productions, in the mines, and, above all, in the honest labor of the people, is found the basis of wealth. Money is but a part of the machinery, and a very small part, too, by which exchanges between the people who own this wealth are facilitated. This machinery must be adapted to the work it is intended to perform, and for the purpose of encouraging these interchanges among the people it must have their confidence. The confidence of the business world must be behind every financial system to enable it to perform its proper function. There can be no confidence without stability, hence the introduction into our money system of an element that will disturb that confidence, instead of encouraging business, retards it; instead of extending, it contracts it; instead of bringing prosperity, it invites disaster. There can be no more effectual way of contracting the circulating medium of a country than by undermining the confidence of the business world. The moment confidence begins to depart that moment the best part of the money begins to disappear from the channels of trade and goes into the vaults for safe-keeping. The moment confidence is restored it comes out of these vaults, enters the channels of trade, revives business, starts the factories, employs labor, and helps to restore prosperity.

But it is contended by the advocates of this measure that by reason of the demonetization of silver in the different countries of the world that it has greatly depreciated in value, and that gold, by reason of the great demand for it, has appreciated, and that consequently the prices of all farm products particularly have fallen. I have not the time or the inclination to enter into an extended discussion of this question. Both sides of this proposition have been ably presented by different gentlemen upon this floor, and I was particularly interested in the charts exhibited on the one side by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] and on the other by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and another gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY]. Without undertaking to reply to these arguments, I want to say that there are so many influences that may operate at different times to change the prices of products that it is impossible, in my humble judgment, to say what may have been at any particular time the sole cause of their rise or decline. Indeed, I am rather disposed to believe that in most, if not all, cases the rise or fall of prices of products is attributable to no one cause alone, but to a variety of influences which operate to bring about the result. We do know, however, that an increased supply of any article without a corresponding increase in the demand for it will put down the price. We also know that when the supply and demand are both increased and there still is a decline in the price of the product that it may reasonably be attributed to the increased supply or the decreased cost of production, or both.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to one or two facts in connection with the decline in the price of silver, and I am free to admit that this decline was caused in part by its demonetization, not by the United States, but by the other countries of the world. In the year 1873, at the time of the commission of the so-called crime against silver, the commercial ratio between the two metals was about 16 to 1—16 ounces of silver being worth a little more than 1 ounce of gold. By reason of the undervaluation of silver it had for years disappeared from the circulating medium of the country, and there was none in circulation at that time. The act of 1873 withdrew no part of the money of this country. It did not contract the circulation by the withdrawal of silver, because there was no silver in circulation to be withdrawn. It did not decrease the demand for silver by dropping it out of the coinage, because there was no demand at that time for it for coinage purposes.

The law of 1873 simply recognized the fact existing at that time independent of the law. Notwithstanding this, silver commenced to decline in price at about that date, and continued to go down until 1894, when the commercial ratio of the two metals was about 1 to 33. If that was the only noticeable fact in connection with the decline of the white metal, and if the conditions had remained during the whole period of its decline the same as at the beginning, it would be reasonable to draw the conclusion that its demonetization was the cause of that decline. But it appears that for the period from 1866 to 1870 the average annual production of silver in the world was $55,663,000, and for the period from 1871 to 1876 it was $81,864,000, and for the period from 1876 to 1880 it was $101,850,000, and from 1881 to 1885 it was $118,955,000, and that it continued to increase in about the same ratio until 1894, when the annual silver product of the world was about $215,000,000, or nearly four times as great as in 1873.

Is it possible that this enormous increase could have had no effect upon its value in the market? I am not arguing that this was the sole cause of its decline, but I do contend that it was the prime cause. This position is sustained by the fact that after the discoveries of gold in California and Australia that metal declined in value, although there was no decrease in the demand for it. In 1846 the commercial ratio between gold and silver was 1 to 15.90. In 1852, during which time the annual gold supply had increased from about $38,000,000 to $150,000,000, the commercial ratio of the two metals went down to 1 to 15.32. If the increased production of gold at that time caused a decline in the price of that metal, may it not be reasonably assumed that the enormous increase of silver has been the prime cause of its great decline in value? Nor did the world cease to use silver as money at the time it was demonetized. In fact, the United States used more of it and coined more after that date than it had in all the time since the organization of the Government. During the period from 1873 to 1894 the total silver introduced into the circulating medium of this country amounted to nearly $540,000,000, and the total silver coinage of the world during that period amounted to $2,756,423,015. For the same period the world's coinage of gold amounted to $3,404,703,469, being in excess of the coinage of silver by $548,280,454. This does not indicate, as it seems to me, that silver has been ignored or that the demand for it has been lessened by the legislation referred to in any such way as to account for its heavy decline in price during that period. To me it seems much more reasonable to believe that its decline is attributable chiefly to the enormous increase in the production of the metal and the decrease in the cost of that production.

But it is said it is not the intention to increase the value of the silver dollar so much as to decrease the value of the gold dollar. That the latter has appreciated in value greatly since 1873 by reason of the unusual demand for it, and that this accounts for the low price of everything and general stagnation of business. I would not undertake to say that the circumstances and conditions are not such as to justify the belief that gold has appreciated to some extent, but I believe if there has been any appreciation at all it has been so slight as to have had but little or no effect upon prices. It is said that farm products have gone down in price. So they have at times, and at other times they have gone up. When wheat, and corn, and hay, and pork go up in price it is attributable, say the free-silver advocates, to some local considerations or a general decrease in the supply, but if they go down it is charged to the demonetization of silver. A better and more satisfactory test, as it seems to me, is to measure the gold dollar by wages. A single large crop of wheat may fill the granaries of the world and force down the price of that cereal. Unfavorable weather in the corn-raising districts, while that crop is being grown, may cut it short, thus lessen the supply and increase the price. Not so with labor. The supply of and demand for labor is not so likely to fluctuate. Now, how has this so-called appreciation of gold affected wages?

From the report made by Colonel Wright to the Senate Committee on Finance in 1893 it appears that the purchasing power of a day's wages has risen from 138.5 per cent in 1873 (starting with 100 per cent in 1860) to 175.4 per cent in 1891; so that the purchasing power of wages was greater after the demonetization of silver than it was before. If the so-called crime against the white metal was the cause of the decrease of prices in farm products, why did it not at the same time cut down the purchasing power of wages? This fact furnishes another reason for the maintenance of a stable circulating medium—one that is not constantly fluctuating. There is no better index to the prosperity of the country than the employment of its labor at good wages. When labor is employed and well paid the country is prosperous, because it is increasing its wealth. The report which I have referred to shows further that during the depreciated-currency period, between 1862 and 1879, prices all increased as measured by the new standard, but wages did not increase in proportion.

The laboring man was the first one to feel the effect of the increased prices of the articles he had to buy for his daily consumption, but was the last one to get the benefit of it in the increase of his wages. Prices rose from 100 per cent in 1860 to 190.7 per cent in 1865, while wages only increased during the same period from 100 to 148.6 per cent, which gave a purchasing power of only 77.9 per cent as compared with 1860. Nominal wages were higher than ever, but the wage earner was actually making less than he was in 1860. It is sometimes said that silver is the workingman's money, but the workingman is as much interested in having a stable standard of value as anyone else. He lives by his daily labor and with his wages he purchases each day the necessaries of life. He is the last one to get the benefit of a rise in prices. It touches everything that he eats and wears before it touches his wages. He needs a dollar that will not fluctuate in value, because he can not change his wages to suit the fluctuations. It is always a difficult thing to increase wages; it is sometimes done, but ordinarily only after a strike or a lockout. Everything that he buys, however, responds very quickly to changes in the quality of the money, so that it is to his interests to have as few of these changes as possible.

Mr. Speaker, the question presented by this measure is one of great importance to the American people. We all concede that, some of us from one standpoint and some from another. I believe the representatives of this great nation, North, South, East, and West, are equally patriotic in their earnest desire to solve this question so that it will redound to the eternal welfare and happiness of this great people. It ought not to be a question of what will benefit this section or that, but what will increase the prosperity of the whole people. All sections are so intimately connected with each other, so allied by ties of commerce, patriotism, friendship, and hope for the future, that whatever injures one part of the country affects to a greater or less degree the whole. Nor should it be a question of what will benefit this class or that. We are not here as the representatives of a class, but of all the people. To me it seems to be a question of the stability of our monetary standard. It is not a question of larger use of silver as a part of our monetary system, but it is a question of whether we shall undertake to absorb the silver product of the world in case it shall be presented to our mints for coinage.

In what I have said I have argued on the assumption that the enactment of this measure would bring the country to a silver basis. That there is a possibility of this result from the passage of this bill is virtually conceded by some of those who advocate it. That this would be the result appears to me to be as clear as that the night follows the day when we consider it in the light of our experience and the experience of other nations. This country adopted the double standard in 1792 at a ratio of 15 to 1, but in this ratio gold was slightly undervalued, and very soon, according to a law as inexorable as that of growth and decay, the gold began to disappear from circulation and by 1817 there was none left. From that time until 1834, although legally we were on a bimetallic basis, as a matter of fact and for all purposes of business we were on a silver basis.

The act of Congress passed for the purpose of establishing bimetallism was as ineffectual for that purpose as the blowing of the east wind. An attempt was then made in 1834 to reestablish the ratio by increasing the amount of silver in that dollar and to bring the legal ratio more nearly in harmony with the commercial. By that act the ratio was fixed at 16 to 1. At that time the commercial ratio between the two metals was 15.73 to 1. The effect of this was to drive silver out of circulation, because that metal was undervalued by the mints of the country. A metal, just as any product, will always go from the place where it is undervalued to the place where it can be exchanged at a higher valuation. From 1834 until the passage of the act of 1878 we were substantially without silver as a part of the money of the country. Now, if we were not successful in securing the concurrent circulation of these two metals at a ratio of 16 to 1 when their commercial ratio was about 15.75 to 1, how can we expect to do it when the commercial ratio is 32 or 33 to 1?

But it is said that the silver dollar circulates now with gold and has as large a debt-paying power as the gold dollar. So it has, but it is because of the policy inaugurated by the Republican party of maintaining the two metals at a parity. Silver dollars are limited in amount, and are receivable by the Government for taxes and customs dues, and this makes them equal with gold.

It is contended by some that a silver basis would be infinitely better for the country than the present condition of our finances, and Mexico has been cited as a country that is prosperous with a silver circulating medium. God save this country from being Mexicanized! It is true that Mexico has prospered to some extent in the last few years, but this can be said only when her prosperity is considered on the Mexican basis. If the conditions prevailed here that now prevail in Mexico we would think they fell far short of prosperity as we understand that term. The present prosperity of Mexico is accounted for, not by her monetary system, but by her protective system. It is the invasion of that country by American enterprise, encouraged, as it has been, by her protective laws, that has given an impetus to Mexican commercial affairs despite her money system.

I have no particular fondness for gold as gold. I would rather see the two metals circulating concurrently in every nation of the world, and I would welcome an international agreement that would bring about that result. I would welcome an international agreement between this country, Germany, and the nations composing the Latin Union for the free and unlimited coinage of the two metals at a ratio having some relation to their commercial value, because I believe that such an agreement might result in establishing the value of the cheaper metal so that it could circulate as a companion with gold. I would not wait for England to join us in such an arrangement, because I believe that if we would wait for that it would never be accomplished, and I do not regard her assent absolutely necessary. I would also be glad to see the bills of small denominations withdrawn and their place taken by silver. But when it is proposed that this country, single-handed and alone, shall undertake, by opening its mints to the silver of the world, to double the value of that metal, I must enter my protest on behalf of a constituency that has so recently spoken with great emphasis against such a course.

I confidently look forward to the day, not far in the future, when the Republican party, returning to power in every department of the Government, will place upon the statute books a law that will protect American interests, revive American industries, and place this country upon the high plane of prosperity that it once occupied. The present measure would be no fit companion for that. The two would not go hand in hand. This would counteract the beneficial effect of that; it would put us out of gear, so to speak, with the other commercial nations of the world. We are a great nation, capable of accomplishing great things, I will agree, but let us recognize that there are some things that we can not do. We can not change economic laws. To those of you on this side of the House let me say that there is no safety, either for the country or the party, in a departure from one of the cardinal principles of the Republican party, namely, that a parity between all the dollars in circulation must be maintained. I am in favor of as large a use of silver as can be maintained to that standard; but I must oppose this measure, because I believe it means a return to a depreciated dollar, with all its attendant evils; because I believe it would put us on a silver basis, and deprive us of the gold which now gives stability to our money; because I believe that instead of giving us bimetallism in fact it would give us that only in name, and we should have silver monometallism in fact; because I believe it would be in conflict with the expressed purpose and announced principles of the Republican party that every dollar should be as good as every other dollar, and because I believe it would undermine public confidence in our monetary system, and thereby seriously injure the business interests of the whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to add to the illumination that has already been furnished to this subject by so large a number of gentlemen who have ably discussed it. I do not rise for that purpose; but I want it understood that there are a certain number of objections that arise in my mind from a general view of the subject which I would like at least to allude to in my remarks; and I shall vote accordingly. With my present convictions, the bill before us does not recommend itself at all to my approval; and the speeches that have been made upon it, while many of them have been splendid specimens of forensic eloquence and have presented a marvelous array of facts and historical allusions, they have not convinced me that I should be safe in voting for the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

I have noticed that those who deal with this subject in the affirmative, especially, not to mention those who take the other side—that those who advocate the free and unlimited coinage of silver have decorated the discussion with everything that was splendid in the line of speech making, sometimes to the exclusion and damage of convincing argument. We have had logic, history, and rhetoric, and map illustrations, and almost everything possible to create dramatic impressions upon the minds of the House; but after looking over the whole line of arguments and listening to all the discussion I have concluded that it would be unsafe to be controlled by those manifestations.

I confess that I was incomparably charmed with the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE], who stood in his place for more than an hour and threw the fascination of his eloquence over this listening assembly, and without deliberate and calm criticism one might have been disposed to be carried away by his persuasive utterances; but when the blood got cool and the argument was looked into, it was found not to be so cogent and so potent as at first indicated. I felt proud of that gentleman as he made his speech here. I felt an inspiring self-gratulation that Almighty God had endowed the human mind with such faculties of perception and arrangement and a being with such power of utterance that a speech like that could be produced on so dry a subject as that of the currency and finance. And I thought to myself, I am glad, furthermore, that this gentleman belongs to the ranks of the same great party to which I belong. I congratulated myself that that was in a great measure the kind of stuff that Republicans are made of; and I thought if this man should be carried away from our ranks by philosophic abstractions and untried vagaries, I should regret it deeply, if he should fall out by the way, like the angels that followed Lucifer in the lapse from paradise, always beautiful, but always unfortunate. And then when he brought out his map I can not tell you how picturesque the whole scene appeared to me.

When I saw his little red line of silver, I believe it was, that ran from 1792 to 1873, and then leaped apparently over a chasm, I thought of all those beautiful visions in material nature that appeared to me in days gone by—of the magnificent Falls of Montmorency, of the bridal veil in the Yosemite Valley, falling a thousand feet at a stroke, and of the great Niagara, with its thunderings, and I tried to imagine whether I could not hear the echoes from the chasm into which it fell; but I could not repress another vision which crossed my mind at that particular moment, a vision of a deeper and a darker chasm. I saw great multitudes of the American people marching toward it, and I listened and thought I heard arising the sounds of desolation and the voice of the battling winds, and at the bottom thereof there were bankruptcy, business stagnation, congestion, and national ruin; and that, further, all these perils were undiscovered until it was too late to beat a retreat.

We have had, too, that fascinating figure of the circulation of the blood, which I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] very adroitly and successfully handled when he said that the circulation of the blood would be of no good without the action of the heart—the confidence of the people of the nation. And then I thought of the manifestation of confidence that had been made with regard to this matter within the last few days, when five times the amount asked for by the Government upon its bond loan had been offered by the American people; and I queried whether or not this confidence grew out of the expectation that we should pass a free and unlimited coinage bill or whether it grew out of the assurance that we would resist so radical a measure.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] very aptly referred to that part of the speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] where he rang the changes on the demand, "Do something for silver." The idea struck me that the attitude of silver in this particular regard furnishes the keynote of the argument and the key to the situation. The position of silver to-day is that of a nursling, and we are nursing it. It needs to have something done for it. And I was amused at the plea that the gentleman from California made, that he would have us "do something" for the sake of doing something—do something for the sake of movement—keep moving whether you succeed or not. And I can not but recall the unfortunate illustration with which the gentleman emphasized his position—the illustration of a negro trying to jump through a stone wall. I did not notice that in the gentleman's narration the negro ever got through. I do not think he did. That reminds me of the ancient philosopher who, doubting his identity, attempted to prove it by bumping his own head against a wall, and instead of making a hole in the wall made a hole in his head.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIS. I thought I was to have twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes was the time allowed the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. I have not fairly got into the merits of this question; and I have been waiting a week for the opportunity to say something.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Delaware be allowed ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not sympathize with that kind of faith illustrated by the gentleman from California in his story of the negro attempting to jump through a stone wall. I do not believe, and never have believed, that the Almighty God requires any man to do anything he can not do. He does not recognize a faith that points to the impossible, and neither ought we.

We do not ask the little brook
To turn the wheel;
Unto the larger stream we look.
The strength of steel,
We do not ask of silken bands;
Nor hearts of oak from willow wands.
We do not ask the wren to go
Up to the heights the eagles know;
Nor yet expect the lark's clear note
From out the dove's dumb throat.

But the gentleman from California does seem to expect that we shall undertake to do something that can not be done, and that is to coin all the silver in the world that may be brought to us and keep it at a parity with gold.

Another thought has occurred to me. It has been intimated here that it would be a lamentable thing for us to fall upon gold monometallism as a permanent condition. Now, I want to ask if there is more danger or less danger from our present attitude of going to gold monometallism than there would be of going to silver monometallism with the free and unlimited coinage of silver? Of course I am brought to the choice between the two horns of the dilemma. If we are to come to one or the other I think I had better stay where I am.

This idea of "doing something for silver" presents itself to my mind in this way. We are upholding $600,000,000 of silver to-day, and these advocates of free and unlimited coinage of silver wish us to uphold all there is. The question is, can we do it? We have already performed a herculean task. The camel can bear his load if you do not put on the last feather that breaks his back.

Another inquiry that arose in my mind is this: Are we as a nation ready to stand out in an isolated position against the solidarity of the nations of the world on this matter of silver coinage? We cultivate close and intimate relations with those nations in everything else. Shall we separate from them in this regard? We propose to reciprocate and affiliate and aggregate in the matter of trade; shall we separate and segregate in the matter of money, which is the measure of trade?

This question has been very properly illustrated in this debate by a reference to the Scriptures. "No man liveth to himself." And the remainder of the passage might well have been cited: "No man dieth to himself." That is applicable to this subject as well as to many others. I do not think we are prepared to take that isolated position in reference to the people of the world. We may lead in other things; we may lead in governmental ideas; we may lead in promulgating the great truths of free and popular government, the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity. But the question is, are we strong enough to lead in this matter of finance and to take an isolated position? If we are, then the proposition presents itself to my mind, if we are strong enough to force silver coinage alone then we are strong enough to force an international standard; and that is what we want. I repeat, if we are powerful enough to force on the world free and unlimited coinage we are powerful enough to force an international standard, which I earnestly advocate.

One other thought. It is a formula of the advocates of free silver that money is the creature of law. I agree to that. I believe that the law of custom and legislative law together have made money what it is. But what are the limits of the law? Are they bounded by a single country or a single continent? What is the law but a universal law of the leading monetary and commercial nations of the world? And if we are to move in obedience to the law we must hearken to the law as we find it.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I thought I had one or two quite interesting things to say; some interesting incidents with reference to this last point. The last point is this: I do not like the affiliation of the doctrine of free silver; and I would not speak here offensively to any gentleman nor concerning any gentleman. I do not say harsh things or use harsh terms myself. I have always noticed that those who do are apt to receive them again in return. But I am apprehensive concerning the affiliation of the doctrine of free silver. I find it in company with some of the most radical and revolutionary measures that the country has ever known. You know that in 1832 we had nullification, in 1860 we had secession, and since that time we have had Populism, socialism, spiritualism [laughter]—we have had the single-tax heresy.

Don't let that gavel fall, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] I have got one or two of the best stories to tell you you have ever heard. [Renewed laughter.] Let me get through with them and I have about finished what I wanted to say.

Down in Delaware some time ago there was one of these "single taxers" who came along. People did not know what the thing meant, and he never succeeded in explaining it to them. I was going into town when I caught up to him, took him into the carriage and drove him in. He said, during the conversation that followed, "I have often heard of Delaware, and wondered why I did not see, when I got here, a lot of the blue hens and chickens running around." [Laughter.] He says, "Does it not seem strange that I have not seen them?" I replied, "Why, my friend, that story is a little myth that grew out of the Revolutionary war." He says, "You do not tell me so; I thought it was really a breed of chickens of that kind." [Laughter.] I said, "You tell me that you are a free-silver man?" He said, "Yes, sir, I am; and I know all about it, and I can satisfy these people in Delaware and show them the rights of the matter without any difficulty." "Oh," says I, "that is all right, I like to find a man with the courage of his convictions when he has founded them on extensive knowledge, on large experience, and common sense, it is then a virtue and a force to any man. But when it is only the surmounting of ignorance, and is fed by the secretions of an engorged liver [laughter], it is as disgusting as a jewel of gold in the swine's snout;" and then I put him out. [Great laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Why, I have the best story to tell you you ever heard. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes' extension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is entitled to recognition, but the Chair will submit the request.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Let him go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Two or three nights ago I attended a spiritualistic lecture in this city——

Mr. DOLLIVER. What were you doing in a place like that? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Well, now, that is none of your business, my friend, for after you have delivered such a magnificent speech as you did on yesterday you have much more to do than to ask me questions of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Well, go on and tell us about the lecture.

Mr. WILLIS. I listened to the man on spiritualism. He made a very good talk from his standpoint. He dwelt largely on what he called the "reciprocity of molecular action" [laughter] and proved by it or explained the vibrations of a steel bar, the photographic art, the telephone, the phonograph, and spiritualistic manifestations. He said they all came from the same source. He said that the spiritual consciousness of an individual projected itself by that law of reciprocal molecular action upon the spiritual consciousness of another, and thus manifested itself sensibly. And with this theory he swept away the Bible, the church, the preacher, Jesus Christ, and God himself. [Laughter.] That, he said, was a spiritual manifestation. I thought I would like to have one. However, he told a story of Seth Winchell, who died in Libby Prison, and whose spiritual essence was projected upon the spiritual consciousness of the speaker through the medium of a certain lady. God bless the women! It seems that no great thing can be achieved in the world without some relation to the women. He said the presence of this lady was the medium through which the spiritual consciousness of Seth Winchell projected itself upon his spiritual consciousness.

Seth Winchell revealed to him the fact that twelve years before he had died in Libby Prison; that he died of starvation; that he had been looking for him ever since; that he had written him a letter by the hand of a certain individual, which letter, it seems, he had never received. He went on with that story.

After the lecture was over I said, "I am going to look into this thing," and I went upon the platform, and I said, "My friend, I want to ask you a question." He said, "All right." "When you had the spirit of Seth Winchell there, talking to him, why on earth didn't you find out all about that other country? Why didn't you ask him concerning its latitude and longitude?"

A MEMBER. And its temperature. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; "its temperature, and all that sort of thing. I have been wanting to know about that, and I have thought that if ever I found a house with a ghost in it I should buy it, if God would help me, because I wanted to communicate with some of these spiritual beings that come from the undiscovered country." "Well," he said, "this man's intelligence was of small compass, and he could not do much in that line." "Why," I said, "he had brains enough to tell you he had died in Libby Prison, and that he starved to death, and that he had written you a letter and sent it by another person, and all that. I should think he could tell you some things about the topography of the glory land, or otherwise, as the case might be. But, however," said I, "I want to ask you another question. Are you for free silver or agin it?" [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, he caught me by the hand, and said he, "You bet I am for it every time and all through." Said I, "I am satisfied." [Laughter.] "I do not like the affiliations." [Laughter.] But, sir, there is a great conservative force that stands between the American people and the confirmation of this idea. It is the epitome of the equation of righteousness; it is the embodiment and aggregation of the best political opinion that the world has ever known. It is the great Republican party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I should like consent that the gentleman from Delaware occupy the remainder of the time, and I will take my chance in the five-minute debate to give the gentleman at least some understanding of what the single tax is, and to answer his argument. I think it would spoil his speech and not help me much to interrupt him at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIS. During the other evening session I heard the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], and I have learned to like him very much. I am glad that you did not censure him the other day. I do not think he meant anything wrong at all. I am glad you did what you did with that resolution in sending it to the Judiciary Committee. I thought I heard him say—I suppose it was "in the heat of the moment"—that the Republican party had ruined the country for thirty years. That is a wonderful thing. It "ruined the country" when those fellows were trying to tear down the house over our heads, to destroy the old family mansion, when it stood in the forefront and met their brave legions successfully, and then hung out the white flag, hung up the "bruised arms for monuments," and displaced the roll of the battle drum and the loud clarion of war with the sweet music of friendship and peace and good will. [Applause.]

It "ruined the country" when, through the tortuous methods and times of reconstruction, it steered the old ship safe until we were one people again. It "ruined the country" when it provided for the stretching out of the great ægis of its protection over the industries of America, until the chimneys smoked in every valley and on every hill, and the bread cry ceased in the streets of every city, and the soup houses were closed, and the poor man's table was supplied with bread, and the firesides of the American dwellers were happy from the east to the west, from the north to the south.

It "ruined the country" when, in 1878, it provided for the resumption of specie payments and put the American currency on a solid, living, and healthy basis, so that to-day in every land beneath the sun where monetary transactions are conducted any of our money, whether paper or otherwise, is as good as it is here at home.

It "ruined the country" when, in 1892, it had the largest exports and the largest imports that it ever has had in all its history, and when the exports were $180,000,000 more than the imports, and the currents of trade, and consequently the currents of exchange, were toward our shores. The Treasury was not bankrupt, and the cry did not go forth for the issuing of bonds. "Ruined the country!" Why, sir, the nations of the world stand still and look with wonder upon her prosperity. She has become the cynosure of the observers of creation, and I doubt not that those in the invisible land are well pleased to know that there is a country where every man may be free and prosperous, and where all men may be brothers, and where liberty, equality, and fraternity are the touchstones of peace and the assurance of happiness. [Applause.]

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 11 o'clock and 57 minutes a. m.), Thursday, February 13, 1896, the House adjourned until 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 13, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Maine will——

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to present a report on a privileged resolution? It is an inquiry.

Mr. DINGLEY. If it is privileged, of course it can come in.

Mr. HITT. It is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois.

BERNARD CAMPBELL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back to the House with a favorable recommendation, with one amendment, a resolution which came from the House January 27, and to ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, presents a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the public interest, the correspondence with the Government of Haiti concerning the claim of Bernard Campbell, of Boston, Mass., for injuries inflicted upon him by Haitian soldiers in endeavoring to force him by Haitian into the naval service of Haiti.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "by Haitian," in line 11 of the resolution, after the words "force him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

RECALL OF A BILL.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby requested to return to the House Senate bill 79, for the correction of a verbal error.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 2904.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate has been closed by order of the House, and the Clerk will report the Senate amendment to House bill 2904.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, before making the motion to nonconcur in the Senate amendment, as instructed by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, I may say that it is the intention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to move to concur, and as that motion would take priority, the motion to concur will be the question in order in the Committee of the Whole. Under the order that has been adopted by the House, the bill is to be considered in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule until 4 o'clock, and at 4 o'clock the question is to be taken on what will then be the pending motion, to be made by the gentleman from Georgia, on concurrence in the Senate amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and insert another bill, as sent over by the Senate; and as the negative of concurrence will be nonconcurrence, that will be the only vote taken at 4 o'clock, and that if the committee should recommend nonconcurrence, the bill will be immediately reported to the House with that recommendation. But under an arrangement made between myself and the gentleman from Georgia, who represents the minority of the committee, he desires to close debate in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means to-morrow rather than to-day. If he should then occupy one hour, another hour would be occupied by members representing the majority of the Ways and Means Committee. That would bring the roll call, the vote by yeas and nays, to-morrow soon after 2 o'clock. The votes to-day will be in Committee of the Whole, and, being in Committee of the Whole, the yeas and nays of course can not be called.

I desire to make a simple statement, further, in reference to the parliamentary situation of the bill under consideration in Committee of the Whole this afternoon until 4 o'clock. After the gentleman from Georgia shall have made his motion to concur the bill will be open to a motion or motions to concur with an amendment. The only motion that would then be in order would be one to concur with an amendment, and when one shall be disposed of, then another, and at 4 o'clock, the other motions having been disposed of, the vote will be taken in Committee of the Whole on the question of concurring or nonconcurring, as I have already said.

I have thought it proper, Mr. Chairman, to make this statement of the parliamentary situation, so that gentlemen who are preparing amendments which they desire to offer may be enabled to put them in the parliamentary form of moving to concur with an amendment in the Senate amendment, which is to strike out all of the House bill and to insert instead the Senate bill.

In this connection, I desire to say that, on account of the parliamentary situation, gentlemen will observe that the bill is not in a condition that amendments of a vital character can be properly offered, because that would involve concurrence in the Senate amendment, which, I take it, the majority of the House is unwilling to do. The majority having deliberately passed a bill here, I take it that they do not intend to recede from their action thus deliberately taken. Even if amendments be such as, under other circumstances, as separate measures, the Committee of the Whole or the House would be ready to adopt, they can not safely be accepted in the present condition of the bill. I shall ask, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole reject all propositions to concur with an amendment, in order that we may be brought to the straight question of concurrence or nonconcurrence in the Committee of the Whole; and if there are propositions of sufficient merit to deserve the consideration of the House they should be brought forward as separate measures. Having made this statement, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I was going to direct attention to a fact which has been brought out by the gentleman from Maine in his last remarks, but possibly not with the distinctness it deserves. While the gentleman has stated the parliamentary situation up to the last stage correctly, the fact remains that as the motion that is to be made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to concur in the Senate amendment may be pending at any time with a motion to concur with an amendment, the way for the committee to get at whatever it wants in addition to what the Senate bill carries is, when one amendment to concur with an amendment is voted down, to make another motion to concur with an amendment and vote upon that, and so on.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I have stated that. When one motion to concur with an amendment shall have been rejected, then another motion to concur with another amendment will be in order until 4 o'clock, when the vote must be taken on the straight question of concurrence or nonconcurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. Is there any way by which we can get a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. DINGLEY. You will have that in the House on the Senate amendment.

Mr. BRUMM. But I mean on the amendments that may be offered?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all; unless an amendment should be adopted in Committee of the Whole. If no amendment is adopted in Committee of the Whole, then the only vote to be taken in the House will be the action of the committee on the motion which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] proposes to make, on which there will be a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the committee that I misunderstood the arrangement as set forth in the RECORD of Monday and presumed that the final vote would be taken this afternoon at 4 o'clock. In order to be present on that occasion I have twice postponed matters of a business character that necessarily call me away, and, without any further statement now, and while I can not be present at the vote, I desire the RECORD to show that if I were present I would vote not to concur in the Senate substitute, and would vote also against all amendments that may be proposed.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine a question in regard to the parliamentary situation. If I understand him correctly he says that all amendments must be offered with a motion to concur.

Mr. DINGLEY. To concur with an amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will it be in order to move to concur and strike out all after the enacting clause?

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the amendment of the Senate, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill and insert the Senate bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. My question is: Will it be in order to move to strike out all of the Senate proposition, leaving only the enacting clause, and to insert?

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. The House bill has been completed by the House and is not subject to amendment here. You can not touch the House bill; all you can touch is the Senate amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then, will it be in order at some stage of the proceedings to offer a substitute for the Senate bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. That would be to move to concur with an amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, certainly; a motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment would be in order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee of the Whole report to the House a recommendation of nonconcurrence in the Senate amendment to the House bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee of the Whole report this bill to the House with the recommendation that the House concur in the Senate amendment. I do not propose now to discuss that question. At a later period, under the arrangement that has been made, I shall have an opportunity of doing so. Pending the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, of course any gentleman may move that the House agree in the Senate amendment with an amendment. Naturally that motion takes precedence of mine, because if my motion shall prevail the matter will be ended and no vote can be had on the other proposition. I suggest, therefore, on behalf of the committee, that if there are a number of amendments which gentlemen desire to offer and on which they wish to have votes taken in Committee of the Whole, it will be necessary for the committee, when a proposition is presented, to discuss it briefly and vote upon it, so that other propositions may be disposed of in the same way; because when the hour of 4 o'clock arrives the consideration of the matter in Committee of the Whole will be closed under the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] moves that the Committee of the Whole report this bill back to the House with the recommendation that the House concur in the Senate amendment. That question takes precedence.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting as follows, to wit:

"SECTION 1. From and after the 1st day of July, 1896, the mints of the United States shall be open to the unlimited coinage of silver the product of mines situated in the United States, upon the same terms and conditions as the same was coined prior to 1873.

"SEC. 2. From and after July 1, 1896, there shall be levied and collected an import duty of 10 cents per ounce upon all silver the product of mines situated out of the United States."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the last part of that amendment, the part dealing with tariff duties, that it is not germane to the bill. This bill does not deal with tariff duties.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard upon the point of order? The gentleman from Maine makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is not germane to the Senate amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is put in a wrong form for any of it to be in order. It should be a motion to concur with an amendment. You can not move to strike out all after the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to concur with the amendment which has been read.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is his motion, to concur with an amendment, is his amendment intended as a substitute for the Senate substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand as to that. The gentleman from California will perhaps answer the question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is owing to the condition of my health that I have failed to understand either the Chair or the gentleman from Maine as to whether the point of order is made against my entire amendment or only against the second section of it.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition of the gentleman from California is practically to nonconcur, and therefore the motion is out of order, because the motion to nonconcur has been already made. The gentleman calls his proposition a motion to concur, but it is really a motion for nonconcurrence. He moves to strike out all of the Senate proposition after the enacting clause. That is not concurrence; it is nonconcurrence.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the gentleman from California can probably modify his amendment so as to bring the first part of it within the rule. He must put his amendment in the form so that it shall be an amendment of the Senate substitute, not touching the House bill, which is not open to amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is what I intended to do, Mr. Chairman. My motion was to amend the Senate substitute. The intention that I had was to move to concur in the Senate substitute by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting an amendment, or a bill, providing for the coinage of American silver and levying a duty upon foreign silver. That was what I wanted to do, and if my motion is not in order and gentlemen will tell me why, I shall be much obliged and will try to change it so as to make it in order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he moves to strike out all after the enacting clause, which takes the whole of the House bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am perfectly willing to take it all out. [Laughter.] I did not vote for it. It is not my child. I am willing to kill it at any time or in any way. I am not acquainted with the rules which teach how not to do it. I am acquainted only with the rules which teach us how to do it, not with those rules which teach us how not to do it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out all after the first section and inserting the amendment which I send to the desk. Is that in order?

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman want to leave in the free-coinage provision? It occurs to me that the gentleman will accomplish his object by moving to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out that amendment commencing with section 1 and inserting what he sends up.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That was what I intended; but the Chair, as I understood, ruled the provision out of order.

Now I will follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the portion of the gentleman's amendment which relates to customs duties is not germane to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, I withdraw the second section, so as to have a vote simply on the other. Following the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, I move to concur in the Senate substitute with an amendment striking out that substitute and inserting a provision for the coinage of American silver. I withdraw the second section of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from California state the proposition again?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. At the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], who is an expert parliamentarian in Massachusetts, whatever he may be in Congress [laughter], I ask permission to withdraw my motion temporarily, so that I may write it out in a shape which will represent my views.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California, as the Chair understands, will present his amendment later.

Mr. LONG. I move to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 of the Senate substitute add the following:

"Provided, That this section shall apply to the coinage of silver mined in the United States of America only."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG].

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand, this amendment leaves the free-coinage provision just as it came from the Senate.

Mr. LONG. This confines free coinage to the product of the silver mines of the United States only.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, money adds no value to anything without preexisting labor. Law, within its jurisdiction, fixes the debt-paying value of money by making it legal tender; but real value in money for trade and commerce is no more the creature of law than is value in flocks, herds, and cultivated fields. Law fixes the unit of value, but can not fix or make the value in the unit. That is done by the dealers in the commodities for which money is exchanged, and it is graded according to the cost of production, the supply and demand of money, and the commodities at the time of the exchange. The dealer in the products of labor fixes the value of what shall be received for them. The woodchopper on the banks of the Mississippi River, near the close of the rebellion, when hailed by a steamboat captain, who asked whether his wood was for sale, answered, "Yes." The captain inquired, "How much a cord?" "How do you propose to pay?" "In Confederate money." "Then cord for cord." [Laughter.]

If it were possible to pass a law which would be sustained by the courts providing that every 3-year-old steer should pay a debt of $20, that would be the debt-paying value of the steer; but the butcher, if he bought it, would pay only what its meat, when dressed, could be sold for to his customers. Law can compel the creditor to receive from his debtor what the law says shall discharge the debt. But law can not compel a dealer in the products of labor in the course of trade to exchange his ownership for anything that he does not at the time consider an equivalent of what he parts with.

When contracting a debt, if the seller knows what he must receive his debt in and does not believe the article worth in real value the commodity he is selling, he adds to the price of his commodity so as to make it even; and the greater his doubt or distrust, the greater per cent he adds, until the distrust makes the proposed article of exchange worthless. So every dealer in commodities judges for himself as to the value of articles in actual exchange. But when the value of his commodity is put into a debt, then he must take in its discharge what the law declares legal tender.

Legal tender creates no value; it simply declares what shall pay a debt. A thing of no commercial value is not an equivalent of a product of labor, and no legislative enactment can make it such. It may be used as such temporarily, under the stress of some overruling necessity; but if continued any length of time will, by the inevitable expansion and contraction that must follow, end in bankruptcy and financial ruin. The question before us is whether it would be wise for this Government alone, without the cooperation of any other nation, to open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, stamping 371¼ grains of pure silver as a dollar? When it is thus stamped with the unit we have fixed by law, its debt-paying value is fixed at $1, but its commercial value is not changed. If it were, what would be the use of putting the stamp "One dollar" on 371¼ grains? Why not stamp that amount of silver as $1,000? We could do it just as easily.

Many MEMBERS. Go on!

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROW. I thank the committee, Mr. Chairman, for its courtesy, and I will proceed as speedily as possible with my illustration in reference to the unit value of money.

For successful business at home and in trade with the nations, debt-paying value and commercial value ought to be the same. And it is essential that a standard or measure of values should be recognized alike by all the dealers in the commodities or real values for which the standard or measure is exchanged. Money is the commodity used to facilitate the exchange of other commodities and to settle the difference in the values of the commodities. Its chief employment is to pay balances in business. The standard or measure of values should therefore retain the same value when paid out that it had when it was received; otherwise somebody would be the loser by its use. And it should contain the greatest amount of commercial value in the smallest space; for weight and bulk affect the convenience and expense in its use.

Gold [holding up a twenty-dollar gold piece] represents what the commercial nations of the earth, or the most of them, have adopted as a standard or measure of value. In this gold piece there are twenty units of value by our law; and in this roll of twenty silver dollars there are the same number. But the bulk of the silver is over twenty times greater and the weight is sixteen times greater. The value of the twenty units in the silver, if there was no pledge of the Government to keep them on a parity in the markets would to-day be about one-half of the commercial value of the same units in the gold dollar, while the debt-paying value is the same in each. If, then, there is to be but one standard of value the gold would be preferable by reason of its greatly less bulk and weight. If the two standards of gold and silver could be kept equal—that is, interchangeable in purchasing power—then it would be best to have both, for thereby the silver could be added to the volume of circulation.

If our mints were now opened to the free and unrestricted coinage of silver at 16 to 1, what would be the result? A merchant in France, Germany, or England owing our citizens $1,000,000 could bring silver and have it coined here, and if the commercial value of silver, 371¼ grains, in his country was 50 cents he could have what cost him $500,000 stamped at our mint for $1,000,000, with which he could pay his debts. But an American merchant owing in either of these countries could not do the same thing by taking the American silver dollar there. His $1,000,000 in standard American silver dollars would pay his creditors there $500,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROW. I should be very much pleased to have the further indulgence of the committee for five minutes, and then I will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeding for five minutes longer?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in December last this House, in partial response to the urgent call of the President, passed a bill, which has been nominally returned to us by the Senate, but which is not really before us. The House has the power to originate revenue bills and the Senate has the power simply to amend them. Under a claimed power of amendment the Senate has struck out of the House bill everything after the enacting clause and has sent us an entirely different measure. If such a proceeding was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when they gave the Senate the power to amend revenue bills then the right of the House to originate such measures is not worth the ink required to write it into the Constitution.

When the House bill was sent to the Senate there could be no question as to the truth of two propositions: First, that the Secretary of the Treasury then had the power to issue bonds; and second, that it was necessary for him to exercise that power in the near future, in order to prevent a collapse in the Treasury. The House gave him no new authority, but simply modified that which he already possessed. Instead of requiring him to issue thirty-year 4 per cent bonds, or a bond for a shorter term at a higher rate, in order to provide temporary funds, it gave him the power to issue five-year 3 per cent bonds, and the bill was passed with a speed which the urgency of the situation required.

After six weeks of delay and of academic debate on other questions, the Senate returns to us a new measure. The Secretary had already been compelled to act, and the cost to this country of the failure of the Senate to adopt the House bill can be pretty accurately measured. The total minimum interest charge that must be paid by the people on the one hundred-million-dollar loan recently placed will be $116,000,000. The total minimum interest charge on a loan of that size under the House bill would have been $15,000,000. It is a significant fact that the House measure of relief was set aside against the votes of Senators who represent a majority of 10,000,000 of the American people. Such is the unequal composition of that body that the people will be compelled to pay an excess of more than $100,000,000 of interest, nearly equal to the cost of the Revolutionary war, on account of the contemptuous levity with which the House bill was treated by the Senate, and against the protests of the great majority of the people through their representatives in both Houses of Congress.

It seems to me that this indicates the propriety of our discussing to-day a change in the composition of the Senate rather than the free coinage of silver, and if it can not be made a more modern or representative body on account of the peculiar provision of the Constitution with regard to the equal representation of the States, then it may be pertinent to discuss the question of reducing the powers which that body has under the Constitution.

The Senate bill, while ostensibly for bimetallism, is really for silver monometallism. It requires a change in our standard of money which would produce a financial revolution in this country. Ever since the 1st of January, 1879, our dollar has been worth the intrinsic value of the gold in a gold dollar, for, in effect, gold is our money of ultimate redemption. If the Senate bill should pass, there can be no question that our dollar of redemption would be the silver dollar. There is nothing more unsocial than currencies of different values, and it is beyond the power of any Government to compel moneys of different values to circulate on terms of equality. So that, beyond all question, the unit which would measure all debt and all values in this country under the Senate bill would be the value of the bullion in the silver dollar.

Admit, for the sake of the argument, everything that has been said by the advocates of free coinage with regard to the stability of the value of silver and the increase of the value of gold, and they have not justified in any degree such an abrupt and revolutionary change in our standard of value. But their arguments to prove the stability of the value of silver utterly fail. It is doubtless true that the common articles of use have decreased in value since 1873, as compared with gold, but it must be remembered that the methods of production have improved and have been greatly cheapened. If new inventions enable us to produce shoes or cotton cloth at one-quarter of the labor cost of 1873, it would be absurd to ask that we should use a standard of value which would maintain its par with the old and exploded methods of production. The unit of production is human labor, and if you will compare the wages of 1873 and those of 1893 with gold, you will find that all grades of labor received higher wages in gold in 1893 than in 1873. [Applause.]

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. BLUE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], in his remarks a few moments ago, accounted for the maintenance of our silver circulation at a parity with gold by the pledge contained in the act of 1890 declaring that it was the policy of this Government to maintain all of its circulation at a parity, and some gentleman on the other side of the House, in addressing himself to this question in this debate, accounted for it in the same way. I think, sir, there is no support for this contention, because if the declaration contained in the act of 1890 is all that sustains the parity of our silver circulation now, the question arises, What sustained it from 1878 to 1890, when no such pledge existed?

When the Bland-Allison Act was under consideration in the Senate and in this House, it was argued by some of the greatest men of the nation in both Houses that, according to all known laws of finance, the dollar which was going to be issued under the provisions of that act being a depreciated dollar would necessarily drive out all money intrinsically more valuable, and result in placing the country on a silver basis, with silver as our only circulation. It was contended that as the silver which would make up that dollar was not worth at that time more than 90 cents, the operation of Gresham's law, which it was argued was invariable, would produce the results which I have stated. And it seemed, Mr. Chairman, that that argument was perfectly logical, the only answer made to it at the time being that made now, that the increased use of silver, to result from its restoration to coinage even in this limited way, would cause such a rise in its value that it would not become depreciated as money.

But those who opposed the law failed to take into consideration this fact, that while the dollar which was going to be issued would be intrinsically worth less than its face called for, no more of such dollars could be issued under the terms of the proposed law than uses could be found for at a parity with gold. So long as the circulation of that money is thus limited, so long it will be at a parity with gold, and whenever that limit is passed it will cease to be at a parity with gold. The United States takes from the people of the Government every year between five and six hundred million dollars for the payment of the expenses of the Government. There were being issued at that time, under the provisions of the Bland Act, about $2,000,000 per month. Of course the money thus issued would be worth its face in gold, because every dollar of it would serve the purposes of a gold dollar, and the same condition of things has existed until now.

As the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] has just said, there is not a nation on earth which limits the circulation of its silver to an amount that can be used that does not maintain it at a parity, and there is not a nation on the earth that exceeds that limit, there is not a nation that permits the unlimited coinage of all the silver brought to its mints, that is not to-day upon a silver basis, with its money not worth one cent more than the market value of the metal contained in it. If these be facts, and I believe no one denies them, our ability to bring about a different result, that is, to maintain the parity of silver with gold when admitted to coinage without limit and cost, must depend upon the assumption, and only upon the assumption, that the greatness and power of the United States are sufficient to supersede the operation of the well-known laws of finance which control matters of this kind throughout the world.

I do not see, Mr. Chairman, that that assumption rests upon any rational conclusion which can be drawn from admitted facts. No nation ever has been able to control financial laws by legislative enactments. We can not by a statute of Congress give a value to a piece of metal which it does not possess except in the way I have indicated. So long as we keep the total issue of silver circulation within the limits which I have referred to, that is, sufficient to pay the taxes and to a certain extent for exchange purposes in the United States, so long the dollar will be worth 100 cents in gold. But the very moment you pass that limit you follow the example of all the nations—many of them with more population and using as much money as the people of the United States—that have by the unlimited coinage of silver put themselves and kept themselves upon a silver basis.

All the powers of this Government and of the people of the United States, great as they are, are insufficient to permanently negative what may be called the natural laws of trade and finance, and our present financial condition proves the truth of this statement. Notwithstanding the declaration in the act of 1890 that the United States will maintain the parity of its circulation, notwithstanding the fact that her silver money is full legal tender for all debts, and that every dollar of it is practically redeemed annually by being absorbed in payment of taxes, yet as a matter of fact this very money is discredited. While it is the equal of gold in debt-paying and purchasing power, it is not the equal of gold as a repository or depository of value, and hence does not as freely and equally serve all the functions of money. From this fact, and this fact alone, that silver is intrinsically worth less than it calls for, no one keeps it longer than he can get rid of it. No one will exchange gold for it in any considerable sums, because gold will do to keep and it will not.

It is as good as gold to pay debts and taxes, hence is in active circulation; it will not do for a rainy day, hence it is not put away by those who are providing for such weather. An illustration of this feeling recently came under my own observation.

A farmer who was an ardent free silverite, and, I think, a Populist, made a sale of some cattle, and desiring to put away the money, stipulated that the price should be paid in gold. He did this, he said, because, while he believed silver was as good as gold, he might be mistaken about it, and he didn't want to run any risks.

If with a circulation of less than five hundred million, which the United States is not only pledged to maintain at par, but which it redeems every year by accepting for taxes, the unrest in the public mind has resulted in the practical depreciation of one form of money to which I have referred and the consequent hoarding of the other form, intrinsically more valuable, what would be the result if all limit was taken off and the country confronted with the fact that silver would be added to our circulation so long as the bullion was less valuable than the coined money?

One of two results would be inevitable—we would either raise the silver of the world to a parity with gold at a ratio of 16 to 1 or our silver would descend to the level of its bullion value as fixed by the markets of the world.

In the former case the hopes of those who think all blessings flow from a depreciated circulation would be sadly disappointed; the latter would entail losses almost beyond computation.

Mr. Chairman, the idea has been industriously cultivated that the volume of money controls values, and that the mere addition to our circulation of silver, or any other kind of money, would have the effect to increase the prices of products and restore general prosperity; and it is because of this conviction in the minds of the people that they give so strong a support to the demand for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. In my judgment the facts of our own history explode the theory. Cheap money raises prices, whether the volume be large or small, that is when the volume is sufficiently large to displace all that is, more valuable, but abundance of money, intrinsically worth as much as its face value, while it stimulates trade does not inflate values.

This fact is proved by the effect upon our markets of the issue of greenbacks during and after the war between the States.

As this form of circulation (not money, because it never was money and is not now) declined, prices rose. After the resumption act was passed and greenbacks began to appreciate prices declined until the greenback price represented the gold price. Meantime there had not only been no contraction, but on the contrary a gradual increase in the volume of our circulation; in fact, we have now more money, in the aggregate and per capita, in the United States than we had during the period of the highest inflation in the years immediately succeeding the close of the war or any period prior to the resumption of specie payments.

In the light of these facts how can it be expected that the mere addition of silver in any quantities to our circulation can increase prices, unless the money thus added is depreciated? If the silver dollar continues to be worth as much as a gold dollar no one will part with it unless he gets in exchange the value of a gold dollar.

This fact, Mr. Chairman, is again illustrated by existing conditions. A pound of American cotton is worth, say, 7 cents, whether paid for in gold or American silver. If sold for Mexican silver it is worth 14 cents, or about that, simply because 14 cents of that silver is the equivalent of 7 cents in gold or American silver.

Now, if our free-coinage friends could enact their ideas into law and maintain, as they claim, the parity of our circulation, we would still receive 7 cents in gold or silver for our cotton. If, on the contrary, our silver should depreciate to the level of the silver of other countries, we would receive 14 cents in silver, but it would be worth in purchasing power only 7 cents of our present money. I think, sir, these deductions are fair and reasonable, and show the fallacy of the usual free-silver arguments.

In ancient times men wasted their lives and fortunes in the vain effort to discover the process by which nature formed the precious metals, and seemed oblivious of the fact that the mere discovery of the secret of nature would destroy the value of the product.

Then, as now, the vain effort is being made to overcome natural laws and create riches by legislation instead of by labor.

The people have been indoctrinated with the idea that values are created by law, and that legislation can dispense with effort. I do not believe in any such doctrines nor that any class of our citizens would be benefited by the degradation of our circulation, except those who might be enabled to pay their debts in depreciated money. All disclaim any desire to do so, and common honesty would forbid the adoption of any policy which would lead to such a result.

Neither do I believe, sir, that it would be possible to avert such financial disturbances as to paralyze the business of the country for years if we agreed to the Senate amendment. In discussing this subject in the last Congress I took occasion to say that in my judgment the national platform of the Democratic party did not contemplate the enactment of such legislation.

After quoting the platform, I said:

This, sir, could only be accomplished by an act which, while it limited coinage by such conditions as would avoid the danger of placing the country on a silver basis, would recognize silver as a money metal and not treat it as a commodity, as was done by the act of 1890.

The experience we obtained from the operation of the Bland Act proves conclusively that silver coinage limited to the needs of the country can be sustained on its own merit, and without being convertible into gold, and no law which falls short of admitting silver bullion to the mints, to be coined into money on a ratio fixed by law, can restore it to the value lost by being demonetized.

There is not a line or syllable of that law (the Bland Act) which makes the Government in any way responsible for the dollars coined under it, or the certificates issued against their deposit in the Treasury. They are legal tender for debt only, yet notwithstanding their bullion value depreciated 40 per cent, they continued to circulate as freely as Treasury or bank notes. Mr. Speaker, the clear duty of the Democratic party, in my judgment, was to enact such a statute. We could not go to the length of free and unlimited coinage without running the risk of having more silver coined into money than the business of the country would sustain at par. I do not say that such would have been the result, or that I believe it would, but if the arguments of those who advocate the single standard be true such would have been the consequence. Under the limitations of the platform we were not authorized to make the experiment or run the risk. We did not promise the people that we would. On the contrary that by the safeguards of legislation we would insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in payment of debts.

These remarks were made on the 1st of November, 1893. Since then the views I then expressed have to some extent been modified. I did not feel certain then that the unlimited coinage of silver would result in silver monometallism. I firmly believe it now, and I have become convinced that the double standard, so called, is a fiction of the imagination—a myth which has no existence in fact. We may measure transactions by gold or by silver, but not by both, unless they are at a parity. Then you have at best one standard.

I maintain now, as I did then, that a law providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver is not called for by the platform of my party; that it would be ruinous to the best interests of the country, and I shall therefore vote against the Senate amendment.

Mr. HUTCHESON obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I rise to a point of order. I submit that further debate on this question is out of order, and I refer the Chair to paragraph 5 of Rule XXIII. I do not want to cut off anybody who may want to address the House, but I should like a vote on this question within a reasonable time. If a general agreement can be reached that the debate be limited to ten minutes, I make no objection to the continuance of the discussion; otherwise I must insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is familiar with the rule to which the gentleman refers, but under the practice in the Committee of the Whole it is usual to allow the five-minute debate on an amendment to run on, under the theory that gentlemen desiring to speak will move to strike out the last word or make some other pro forma motion, until a limitation of time is fixed. That has been the practice.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be limited to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that debate on the pending amendment be limited to fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman, I have not troubled this House during this session with any remarks; and as this debate has been limited to fifteen minutes, I should like to have ten of them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] be extended so that he may have ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to occupy the last five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] be allowed five minutes additional time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] who spoke on this subject yesterday is in the Hall; he was here a few minutes ago. I desire to answer for him the question which I asked him in the course of his speech and which he very properly declined to entertain because he had not time. But I considered that question adjourned until such time as I might be able myself to answer it.

Gentlemen who saw the figures and the maps exhibited to this House by the gentleman from Minnesota will recollect this statement made by him: That never in the history of this country had human labor and the wages paid to human labor been able to buy more, and the laborer to consume more, than in 1891, just preceding the time the Republican party passed out of power. I put to the gentleman this question: If that was true, how was it that the Republican party sustained such a signal defeat in 1892? The gentleman replied that it was because the people did not know that they had a good thing when they did have it.

The gentleman was pleased likewise to illustrate his argument by the figure of an elephant; and though I have not an artist here to draw an elephant, I ask the gentleman to carry the elephant in his mind and I will show him what constriction upon that animal caused the people of this country to defeat, and justly defeat, the Republican party. I will show him that while the proportions of the animal in tail and ears and trunk and proboscis were what they had ever been, that except in the capacity and power to consume, that animal was shrunken into such a condition that he did not look like an elephant, but like an elongated weasel, to the people of the country.

I propose to introduce some statistics from the same source to which the gentleman referred and to demonstrate that the people of this country had been reduced to a condition of consumptive capacity beneath what has ever existed in this country from 1873 up to to-day under any Administration, Democratic or Republican.

I refer the gentleman to the table which is to be found in the Statistical Abstract, page 281. In that abstract it is shown that the capacity of this country for the consumption of wheat for fifteen years had been something over 5 bushels to the man, reaching sometimes as high as 7 bushels to the man; but in 1891 it was reduced to 4.58 bushels to the man—less than it had been during fifteen years. And because the people of this country who had been able to eat 7 bushels of wheat were under your Administration able to eat only 4.58 bushels, they drove the Republican party out of power in order that they might get to eat more wheat. [Applause.] And that is not only true with regard to wheat, but of other articles of consumption.

Gentlemen will say that the reduced consumption of wheat was compensated for in some other commodity. I deny it. Take the commodity of corn. The people of this country had been able to consume from 35 down to 28 bushels each, but in the good year 1891 they came lower than in twenty years. They consumed only 22.79 bushels of corn per man. Therefore, because your party stood between them and the corncrib the people of the country drove you out of power. [Applause.] And not only that, Mr. Chairman, but in coffee, in tea, and every other commodity, except that commodity to which a man goes in suffering, and that is the swill cup. Notwithstanding every commodity that furnishes fruit for nourishment to the human body had been reduced, and his capacity to consume diminished, so desperate had become his condition that he went to whisky and beer drinking, and from a capacity theretofore to consume of distilled spirits only 1.26 gallons he immediately became driven to consume 1.42 gallons, in order to drown the sorrow brought about from being denied the wheat, corn, and other necessities of life in this country.

He was not content, however, with simply drinking that much more spirits, but in the same ratio he increased the amount of malt liquors consumed by him from 10 to 15 gallons. You drove him from the capacity to live upon the commodities and necessities of life and forced him to subsist upon stimulants, and in his lucid moments from drunken orgies he at last saw the truth that you were driving the country to bankruptcy and a condition in which it would be impossible for any man to live.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I always yield with pleasure to my friend.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. I simply wish to ask the attention of my friend to two questions. First, is it true that they voted the way they did because they were drunk? [Laughter.] And second, why was not the money paid for whisky used to buy food and clothing?

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman, a man forgets his own selfishness when he is drunk, and, waking from his debauch, he recognizes the error of his many Republican sins and transgressions, and in true penitence returns to at least transient reason and rights a wrong to himself and the country. [Applause.]

I wish I could follow this further. I could show that this particular condition continued with reference to all matters relating to progress; but the debate is limited. I recognize the fact that I stand here to-day at the burial of silver by this Congress, and possibly by this generation. [Applause.] I have never been an extremest. I have always doubted the power of the Government to coin at 16 to 1; but as against the greater calamity I stood prepared to vote on that question.

I have listened to the attitude of gentlemen from the Republican side on this question during this discussion, and when I have defined it I will take my seat. Speaking in the language of Mr. BROSIUS, and using the gesticulations of Mr. DOLLIVER, their attitude to the silver question is that they feel toward silver that it is the spiritual cognoscence of psychological irrefragability connected with the concuitant ademption of uncolumnient spirituality and the etherialized contention of subsultory concretion. [Great laughter and applause].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring the Committee of the Whole back to the consideration of the pending amendment. The pending proposition is to concur with the Senate amendment, with an amendment to the first section to the Senate amendment limiting the free coinage of silver to the American product solely.

My first objection is, even were this such a provision as I would be prepared after appropriate consideration to legislate upon, that the adoption of the motion would be in effect to set aside entirely the bill which passed the House over a month ago—a bill intended to reduce the rate of interest on bonds issued under the act of 1875, to shorten the time during which they should run, and to provide that the proceeds of the bonds should be used only for redemption purposes. Now if we should concur in the pending motion we should vote to recede from all that we have done in that direction.

My second objection, coming to the merits of the amendment, is that if we were to adopt that policy it would be necessary to accompany it with provisions to protect the revenue and the mints. It would be necessary first to provide a duty on foreign silver. It would be necessary in the next place to provide very careful restrictions and limitations for the purpose of ascertaining the American product, even if it were practicable to ascertain the same. But to do it in this way, with this simple, loose provision, would inevitably invite fraud and invite a large amount of foreign silver, admitted free of duty, to be placed in American mines surreptitiously and brought forth as the American product.

My next objection to this amendment is that it has none of the merits of bimetallism. Whatever merits there are in full bimetallism—and I accept them within reasonable limitations—depend entirely on having one uniform commercial ratio of silver throughout the world; and unless that is secured you do not obtain the benefits which have been presented—and which to a certain extent I accept—from full bimetallism. This is not full bimetallism. It does nothing at all to affect the value of the standard, unless you propose to have the two metals part company under this plan. That, I take it, is not the contemplation of those who advocate it.

If, then, this is a proposition looking to the preservation of the parity of gold and silver, I say to you that it is a most unjust provision; for if the parity is to be preserved you are to admit 50,000,000 ounces or thereabouts of American silver to be coined free of charge, and the profit of that coinage to go to the owner of the silver bullion. If you are to coin in that way, and the Government is bound to maintain the parity between gold and silver, then coin precisely as was done under the act of 1890, and let the whole people of the United States, the Government, have the benefit of the coinage of 50,000,000 ounces a year. Therefore I say that from any point of view the proposition to simply coin the American product, and to give the profits of that coinage to the private owners of the silver instead of giving it to the Government, can not be maintained.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my friend vote for such a proposition as he has indicated?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask that the pending amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House concur in the Senate amendment, with the following amendment: Add to section 1 of the Senate substitute the following: "Provided, That this section shall apply to the coinage of silver mined in the United States of America only."

The CHAIRMAN. Those who favor the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG], to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment just read, will say "aye."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BRODERICK) there were—ayes 41, noes 118.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 16, section 2, insert the following:

"Provided, That when the commercial value of either gold or silver bullion shall be less than the coinage value of the same, then the seigniorage upon all coinage of gold or silver bullion shall be retained by the United States, equal in amount to the difference between the coinage value and the commercial value of the same when presented at the mint."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] desire to be heard on this amendment?

Mr. BRUMM. I do; but I desire to conclude the discussion upon it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, as an advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1 by the United States, independent of any other country, I gladly and cordially indorse and shall support by my vote the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM]. I will tell you why I do so. Our contention always has been, and is now, that the opening of the mints of the United States to the free and equal treatment of gold and silver will place the market value of those two metals upon a par. I believe that to be a fact, and I believe that by the time you open your mints and have the gold and silver deposited there for coinage there will be no disparity between the market and the bullion value of the two metals.

If I am wrong about it, then I am willing to concede that it is only right and proper and fair that the difference between the coinage and market values shall revert to the Government and not to the owner of the silver bullion. I hope that every advocate of the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 can convince himself of the absolute consistency of that position and cast his vote in support of this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that the difference between the coinage and market value of the silver shall go to the Government of the United States. We must be fair about this proposition. If there is no difference, then there will be no seigniorage to go to anybody, and if there is a difference then this seigniorage should very rightly and properly go to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the distinguished gentleman from Maine had offered some solution of the present difficulties. We have had propositions made from other sources, but none from him. Those of us who are advocates of the free coinage of silver, straight and independent, by the United States have offered you a system that for four thousand years has been demonstrated to be a safe one. It is true that the Populist party has had a number of different remedies for the situation; and I am advised that they are about to add three additional planks to their platform. One of them is to make a cross between a lightning bug and a honeybee, for the purpose of enabling the bee to work at night. [Laughter.] Another one is that of breeding the centipede with the hog, for the purpose of having a hundred hams to each animal. [Renewed laughter.] And I am also told that they have the further visionary scheme of budding strawberry plants into milkweeds, so that everybody can have strawberries and cream from the same plant. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARTMAN. I always yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Do you think that that exceeds in economic ridiculousness the coinage of free silver at the present relative value of silver bullion to gold?

Mr. HARTMAN. I think these ideas are on a parity with those of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness, I think we ought to accept this amendment. I think we ought to meet the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon this floor on this equitable ground, and I hope that every gentleman who entertains similar views will cast his vote for this amendment.

[Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. ANDREWS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. DINSMORE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be limited to twenty minutes. I desire to occupy five minutes at the close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. BRUMM. I desire ten minutes as the author of the amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. It has always been the custom for the member in charge of the bill to close the debate upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, there is more before this House than the mere silver question. The House of Representatives of the United States proposed to the Senate that the interest on Government bonds should be reduced. It was a distinct proposition, asking a reply. The Senate gave us no reply, but asked us in return that we agree that every man who had 50 cents' worth of silver the world over may be allowed to mark it a dollar and pay it out as such.

I have no doubt of the tremendous importance of this last question. I believe—some of my friends do not—I believe that if this be done the dollar will buy less, will pay less wages, will be worth less, and that this practically will effect partial repudiation of debts, both public and private. I believe both as to gold and silver with that most practical of men, even if he were a poet—

> The rank is but the guinea stamp,
> The gold's the gold for all that.

But I believe there is more in this question. When in reply to a proposition we receive no answer, when we receive only a counter question, it is of grave importance whether we have not the right and duty to ask that our own proposition shall be first answered.

The House bill is not to raise money or to issue bonds. It only asks that the interest on the bonds of the United States already authorized shall be reduced. Why was it not answered? I hope it was not because any members in the other body were unwilling to embark upon financial legislation until the House should be forced to agree with their will. I hope not. Any such purpose would be a grave departure from the duties of constitutional government.

It is well known that the lower house of the English Parliament, as a last resort, has refused to pass measures until grievances were redressed. But that house represented the whole people. In this case, 47 Senators who voted or were paired for the substitute represent a population of less than twenty-five and one-half million, and 40 Senators paired or voting against the substitute represent over thirty-five and one-third million—I do not speak of property now, but of the number of people represented. On the average, each Senator voting for the original House bill and against the substitute represents 881,000 people, while 12 of the Senators who voted for the substitute represent together less than 715,000 people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey have an extension of his time for five minutes.

Mr. BRUMM. I shall have to object unless the time of general debate is extended. If the time is extended, I should make no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I am impressed with the belief that there should be some remedial legislation by this Congress. I can not vote for the substitute offered by the Senate, because I believe that it would ruin the American industries. But I am in favor of treating the white metal with all kindness and to use it as far as it may be practicable to maintain it upon a parity with gold.

I know of but three rational, reasonable ways to treat this question. One is to stand, as we now do, with the coinage of silver suspended. The second is to so change the ratio as to make the value of one metal equal with the other. The third is to take silver out of competition with gold. I am in favor of the latter. I refer members of the committee to the manner in which we to-day treat the half dollar, the quarter, and the dime, intrinsically worth less than the dollar. Yet who ever heard of any question as to the value of these subsidiary coins? My proposition is—and I offer it specially to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, upon whom the responsibility of legislation rests in this Congress—to so change our coinage laws as to take silver out of competition with gold. In furtherance of this proposition, whenever it shall be in order, I propose to amend the first section of the Senate amendment by striking out all of that section after the word "gold," in the tenth line on the third page of the printed bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the silver dollars coined under the provisions of this act shall be a legal tender only in the payment of debts in the sum of $100 and less.

The adoption of this provision and the retention of one of the provisions in the Senate substitute which prohibits the issuance of any national-bank notes under $10, and carried further so as to prohibit the issuance of any currency except silver in sums less than $10 and thus prevent gold or other money from coming into competition with silver, and also prevent the competition of silver with gold. I respectfully submit by thus limiting the legal-tender quality of silver, taking the two metals out of competition with each other, would give a field for silver where it would be useful as money and at the same time would relieve it from competition with gold. This would be offering something in behalf of silver which has been so loudly called for by the advocates of free silver on this floor. I believe, sir, that we could risk some experiment in this direction. I believe that by testing it we would at least make some movement in the direction of solving this difficult question.

If, however, forced to take position simply between the bill as passed by the House (which as an original proposition I do not approve or advocate) I should prefer it as a choice between two evils. I shall therefore vote against the Senate amendment as between those propositions. But I insist, Mr. Chairman, that it would be far better to take the substitute now before us from the Senate, amend it, and meet this silver question squarely while it is before us. Let us enact some legislation upon the subject. I believe that either of the two plans I have mentioned would be preferable to our present status of doing nothing, simply suspending the coinage of silver. I would prefer my second proposition to this policy, but think the most sensible and judicious way of treating the subject is to take silver out of competition with gold, which can be done in the manner indicated. I will gladly vote to open the mints of this country again to silver in this or any other manner which will reasonably insure the maintenance of a parity between the two metals, but prefer the present status to a depreciated currency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is a practical one and I hope the members will consider it as such. I believe it is a way out of all of our difficulties.

I want to say to my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who urges us so strenuously to insist upon the original House bill, that there certainly is no reason now for the adoption of that measure, since our bonds have been taken as they have been, unless you contend that this must be retained as a perpetual measure, and, as the bill says practically, only for the redemption of the greenbacks and Treasury notes. My dear sir, that is not stopping the endless chain. It simply means that when you have them redeemed you must again issue bonds and repeat the issuing of bonds.

Mr. DINGLEY. Unless you have revenue enough.

Mr. BRUMM. Having revenue enough will not touch the question at all. That is the great point upon which we differ. This is not a question of revenue in the Treasury exclusively; not at all; but it is a question of this endless chain, for the reason that it is not a question of the expense of running this Government. It is a question of the Government being a hopper in which all exchanges are made upon all securities that are thrown back on our country from the entire world. There is where we are making the mistake, and I beg of you to consider it. As it is now, the great danger and the evil that we are suffering under, in my judgment greater than in any other, is, as I said the other day, the fact that our Government is assuming, and has always assumed, the banking function of exchange. Whenever there is a panic and stocks are thrown upon our market, they go to the Treasury and they say, "These bonds and stocks and securities are payable in coin, but you are fool enough to give us gold with which we can throw our stocks upon the market and get gold for them." What we ought to stop first is the making of our Government a bank of exchange.

There is not another Government in the world that is a bank of exchange; anywhere you can go—to France, and they will pay you just as much per cent and just the kind of money they want. You can go to England, and the Government does not pretend to exchange; they raise the discount, and they are always masters of the situation.

Mr. DINGLEY. But does not my friend know that France does not issue demand notes redeemable in anything? It is the Bank of France.

Mr. BRUMM. I know they do not; but we do, and there is the trouble. We do that which is an impossibility; and for this reason. My friends, this Government alone has produced $2,000,000,000 of gold in the last century—$2,000,000,000 of gold——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have time to finish his remarks.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate upon this amendment be extended for five minutes, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes more.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRUMM. We have produced $2,000,000,000 in gold in the last century. It has all gone from us except, I believe, about $400,000,000. The highest estimate is $500,000,000; and it has gone to countries principally that do not produce gold. Now, the reason for it is that we undertake more than we ever can do. You may try it until doomsday, and you will meet this great obstacle at all times. Do you know, sir, that the individual liabilities of the people in this country to foreigners and the expenditure for interest amounts to very nearly a million dollars a day, and you can not make it up. It is only a question of time. Now, then, you pass this amendment, and not one ounce of foreign silver can be coined in our mints.

This amendment says that when you take your silver to the mint you shall receive from the Government the market value of it, not a mill above it; and when the silver is taken to the mint the owner or holder of it will not get a farthing more for it than the market value, and the owners of silver in Japan, China, England, or anywhere else will not bring it here. They would only bring it under the free-silver craze. There is the trouble. You will have to come together on a common-sense basis. Let the Government pay for the silver at the market value and you have nothing to deal with but the American product, because it will never pay people to bring it from foreign countries unless they can bring it here at a profit.

But gentlemen tell us that the revenues of the Government will answer the purpose. The revenues of the Government can not go to an unlimited extent. For paying the current expenses of the Government they will do very well, and if you add but one clause to the Senate amendment, to wit, that which makes the payer, the Treasurer, the judge as to what kind of money shall be paid, you will remedy the evil. These are the two great propositions. Let the Treasury decide what kind of money they want to pay, then let them coin every dollar of American silver, and in my judgment you will have a parity of value inside of a year from the time that you put that system into operation. It is the only practical solution of this question.

The Republican Senators voted for it—aye, Father SHERMAN and the rest—and I ask the Republicans of this House to stand with us and vote for it. One word more. Give us reciprocity with it, and that reciprocity will enable us to settle our balance of trade with the silver countries in silver. What I mean is this: The balance of trade that is against us is not against us with the gold-producing countries, but is against us in the silver-producing countries. Give us reciprocity and we can get rid of every ounce of our silver by paying that mighty balance of trade with Mexico, China, and the other countries that are silver countries. Of course that must be done in a separate bill, but that is the starting point. Start with us. Give us this amendment. Finish up the balance by a proper revenue bill with proper reciprocity. Make that the banner of Republicanism in the next campaign, and your work is done when your Congress adjourns. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the first place because the motion which he makes is to concur in the Senate amendment striking out the whole of the House bill. I take it that this House is not ready to recede from the action which it took in passing that bill only six weeks ago.

I am opposed to the amendment, in the second place, on its merits. What is it? It is practically an unlimited-purchase act. That is all. It provides that an unlimited amount of silver may be brought to our mints and coined, and that there shall be issued therefor silver certificates; and that whatever may be the difference between the market value and the coinage value shall be covered into the Treasury. That is practically nothing but an unlimited-purchase act. We tried a limited-purchase act to the extent of 54,000,000 ounces a year, from 1890 to 1893, and even that we thought it wise to repeal in 1893. Whether that act ought to have been repealed or not, if it had been an unlimited-purchase act we certainly should have been forced to disaster long before the three years had expired.

Now, I take it that this House, in Committee of the Whole, is not prepared to go into any such policy as that which is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, undertaking to purchase silver without limit—for that is what it amounts to—and issuing certificates for all the silver that may be brought to our mints; for if it fell upon the Government to maintain the parity of all the silver which would be purchased under such a law, as it must fall, we should be undertaking a job such as no other Government ever undertook. We had hard enough work to maintain the parity with what silver we had under the law of 1890, but an unlimited-purchase act would destroy the parity, and, without any of the possible advantages of bimetallism, would bring us to disaster by driving out gold.

I take it that this House is not ready to enter upon any such far-reaching legislation as that, especially when it is proposed simply as an amendment to the pending bill to be acted upon with only a few moments' debate. The proposition is altogether too far-reaching to be disposed of in that manner, and I trust that the Committee of the Whole, even without considering the conditions which exist at this time, will reject the amendment and insist upon the bill which the House passed six weeks ago.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. May I ask the gentleman from Maine a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Is there any proposition for the coinage of silver which the gentleman would agree to except one coming through an international agreement?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have said that the only plan by which we can accept free coinage of silver and secure both gold and silver as our full legal-tender money is by obtaining the concurrence of the commercial nations on an international ratio under free coinage, and that means international bimetallism.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When do you think Great Britain will meet you on that proposition?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not think that it is indispensable, perhaps, provided all the other commercial nations can be included, that Great Britain should be brought in; but I do insist that we can not maintain the parity under free coinage except with the concurrence of such commercial nations of the world, and until we have that I believe in coining just as much silver as we can and maintain the parity, but I do not believe in going to silver monometallism.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let us understand what nations you would be willing to make that agreement with.

Mr. BRUMM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BRUMM, the Chair declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRUMM. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 85; so the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I move to concur in the Senate amendment with the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2, and add to section 1 the following: "Provided, That no silver bullion shall be coined under the provisions of this act unless the owner thereof shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that it is wholly the product of the United States: And provided further, That when the commercial value of such bullion shall be less than the coinage value of the same, then the seigniorage upon all coinage shall be retained by the United States equal in amount to the difference between the coinage value and the commercial value thereof."

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time for the discussion of this amendment be limited to five minutes, of which I desire to occupy only two minutes myself.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CORLISS. I do this, Mr. Chairman, because the amendments that have been already offered, two separate ones, have virtually embraced my amendment, although, in my judgment, they do not extend so far as the amendment proposed by me, nor do they fully accomplish the object that I have in view. My only purpose in offering this amendment is to define my position. The amendment provides that the coinage shall be limited to the American product and that the seigniorage shall be retained by the Government of the United States instead of by the mine owner.

Now, I simply want to say as a Republican upon this floor that in my judgment two-thirds of the American people are to-day demanding action upon this question [applause], and that in my judgment this House should take some action upon it. Are we to stand here forever waiting for other nations to act?

Mr. PICKLER. When we know that they will not act.

Mr. CORLISS. Should not we demand of the President of the United States that he call a conference on this subject? I think that the people of this country demand some action, and I believe the wisdom of this House is sufficient to give them relief upon this question. It is true that we need revenue, but that is not all——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a slight modification of some others that have been offered, but the great objection to it, without going into the merits of the question, is that in concurring with an amendment, even though we might be willing to accept some of its provisions, we should simply set aside all that this House has done on this subject, and therefore, if any proposition is worthy of consideration, it should come here in a bill by itself, be carefully dealt with by the House, considered in all its parts, and acted upon. I trust, therefore, that as the gentleman's amendment is practically a purchase act of what may be called the American product of silver—whatever that may be, for it would include, I take it, all the silver that could be imported and smelted in American works—I trust, I say, that this proposition, or any proposition of this nature, will not be acted upon hastily. A proposition of this character requires careful consideration, looking to the question of the duty upon the foreign product and many other matters which can not be properly considered at this time.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire a moment more to ask a question, and in view of my voluntary limitation of my time I trust the gentleman will grant it to me. Can we be sure that there will be some action taken by the Ways and Means Committee, or coming from that committee, or from any other committee of this House, looking to an early conference of the nations upon this question, the United States taking the initiative?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that gentlemen are aware that at the last session of Congress an act was passed, or rather there was inserted in the sundry civil act a provision drawn by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], in his own language, looking to the assembling of an international conference. Following up the line of that provision, I am in favor of such action being taken as shall on our part invite the leading commercial nations either to a reassembling of the conference of two years ago or unite in a new conference.

Mr. CORLISS. That is what I want to know.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. CORLISS was rejected.

Mr. TOWNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TOWNE moves to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment changing sections 1, 2, and 3 so as to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That any person may deposit for coinage in any mint of the United States gold bullion or silver bullion not less than $50 in value, and sufficiently pure not to require refining before being coined; and the same shall be coined free of charge, the gold into the coins authorized by existing law and the silver into dollars containing fifteen and a half times as many grains of pure silver as there are grains of pure gold in the gold dollar, and nine-tenths fine, being 359.91 grains of pure silver and 39.99 grains of alloy, a total of 399.9 grains of standard silver.

SEC. 2. Said depositor, in exchange for such bullion, shall receive, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, either coins similar to those into which the metal deposited is coined, or Treasury notes of convenient denominations promising to pay an equivalent number of dollars, which notes upon presentation for redemption shall be payable in either gold or silver coin, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. The gold coins, silver dollars, and Treasury notes herein provided for shall be full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The existing silver dollars shall be retired and recoined according to the ratio herein provided, the profits accruing therefrom to be applied to the expenses of maintaining the mints.

SEC. 3. This law shall become operative when the Governments of France and Germany shall have adopted laws under which gold and silver, at the ratio of 1 to 15½, shall have equal access to their mints, and the full legal-tender function be conferred upon the gold and principal silver coins; and upon the passage of such laws by said Governments of France and Germany, the President of the United States shall make proclamation of the fact, and thereupon this law shall take effect and be in force.

And by striking out section 4 of the Senate amendment.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only one word in support of the proposed amendment. It provides in brief for the free coinage of both gold and silver at such time as the Governments of the United States, France, and Germany shall have agreed upon our proposition, our agreement to be signified by the passage of the proposed amendment, and the agreement to go into effect when those other two Governments shall have passed similar laws.

The ratio is placed at 15½ to 1 for the reason that the coinage of those countries is upon that basis; and all that would be necessary to put this provision into effect among the three nations would be that they open their mints. And such recoinage as should become necessary by us could be done in a way to make the recoinage defray its own expenses, by reason of the difference between the 15½ ratio provided in the amendment and our present ratio of 16 to 1 or thereabouts.

The amendment is substantially the bill that was agreed upon by a conference of European bimetallists in Paris a few months ago, and which either has been or will be introduced into the English Parliament, into the Reichstag, and into the French Chamber of Deputies. But I have omitted Great Britain from the proposed agreement upon the understanding, in which I think every man of any information upon the subject will agree, that it is absolutely futile within the present generation to expect Great Britain to agree to any such arrangement unless she is compelled to do so by the action of other nations of great commercial importance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And also because history proves that her concurrence is unnecessary.

Mr. TOWNE. I believe, without entering upon the merits of that argument—and I think there are a great many gentlemen on this floor who agree to that proposition—that with the open mints of Germany, France, and the United States behind the coinage of free silver, and with the right in all these countries to use silver and gold interchangeably and with equal dignity and power in the payment of debts and in all commercial uses, there can not be the slightest doubt—whatever doubt gentlemen may entertain with respect to the power of the United States alone to do it—there can not be under those circumstances the slightest doubt that the parity would be maintained. The amendment commits the United States to no definitive action until those Governments shall have opened their mints; therefore it is not liable to some objections that have been urged here.

I have said all that I care to say, and will only add that I hope gentlemen will vote upon the merits of the question without regard to the fact that the proposition appears here as an amendment to an outworn bond proposition.

[Mr. MOSES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Senate substitute and shall vote against it. First, because it is a measure entirely foreign to the one sent to the Senate from the House. Second, because not a single man who has favored it on this floor believes for one moment that it can become a law should the House concur. Third, because I do not believe it will afford the relief to the Treasury the original measure was designed to afford nor the relief to the business of the country which its friends so confidently expect, but would result in driving one-half of our metallic money from the country and reduce it to a condition of monometallism, a condition so much dreaded by the friends of the measure. Now, I am a bimetallist, and believe in the concurrent use of both gold and silver as money.

I know the men who pose as the especial friends of silver in this Chamber are in the habit of calling all those who do not adopt the idea of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 "enemies of silver," "gold bugs," and "monometallists." But I am not an enemy of silver. I am not a "gold bug" in any sense of the word, nor am I a monometallist. I am a practical bimetallist. "But," say the 16 to 1 men, "what is bimetallism if it does not mean open mints to both gold and silver on equal terms?"

True bimetallism means one of two things—either the coinage of gold and silver as redemption money at a ratio equivalent to the market value of their bullion, or it means the coinage of the two metals as money of commerce at some ratio and under such conventional regulations as will keep the two coins at a parity with each other.

Bimetallism under the first condition is the one demanded by free-silver advocates. It is the method tried in England for three hundred years and failed. It was tried in France and in the States of the Latin Union and failed. It is the one tried in the United States from 1792 to 1873 and most signally failed.

Bimetallism under the second condition is the system now in operation in France, and it has enabled that country to keep in circulation about $500,000,000 in silver at a parity with gold. It is the system now in use in the United, States and has enabled this Government since 1878 to put in circulation six hundred millions of silver and keep every dollar of it of equal value with every other dollar of our currency.

The first is theoretical bimetallism, the bimetallism of the books and colleges and of our free-silver friends. And it has always, at all times and in all countries, been a failure. The second is practical bimetallism, the bimetallism of the Republican party in the United States, and for almost twenty years has proved a success.

I am a Republican, and stand squarely for practical bimetallism on the platform of the party that has done so much for silver, and which, when it comes into power again in 1897, as it certainly will, may confidently be trusted to do more for it, and to correct the evils, if any exist, in our currency system, rebuild the shattered fortunes of our people, revive our prostrate industries, give employment and fair wages to American workingmen, and bring back to our distressed country the prosperity of 1892. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time of Mr. AVERY having expired, by unanimous consent (on motion of Mr. HOPKINS), he was allowed to conclude his remarks.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Alabama—and I call him my friend in no perfunctory sense, because we have been warm friends for thirty years—criticises that part of my speech in which I said this country was on a gold standard from 1850 to 1860, and then from 1880 to 1890. Now, I maintain that a bimetallic standard can only exist where gold and silver remain in concurrent circulation, coined at a ratio without restriction as to either. Suppose we were to enter upon free coinage of gold and silver at a ratio of 50 to 1, that would give us unquestionably a gold standard. Suppose we adopt the ratio of 16 to 1, that would give us unquestionably a silver standard. So you can not maintain, according to my theory, a bimetallic standard where the coinage and the commercial ratios differ.

From 1850 to 1860 they did not correspond. We had no silver practically in circulation. I mean legal-tender standard silver. We coined only 1,700,000 silver dollars from the days of Andrew Jackson down to the suspension of specie payment on the 1st of January, 1862, and we coined in the same time $353,000,000 in gold. Now, I say this historical truth, about which there can be no controversy among intelligent men, bears me out in the statement I made on last Friday, that the country was from 1850 to 1860 practically, to all intents and purposes, on a gold standard.

From 1880 to 1890 we had no free and unlimited coinage of silver. We had a limited coinage of silver. It was then that silver was discredited, as it is now, and the purchasing power of the silver dollar did not depend upon the commercial value of the substance out of which that silver dollar was coined, but it depended upon the power and the ability of this Government to maintain that silver dollar on a parity with gold. Therefore, I repeat the statement, that this country was on a gold standard from 1850 to 1860 and from 1880 to 1890. It is now upon a gold standard. The only trouble is that the commercial world is in constant dread and alarm as to the ability and the disposition of this Government to maintain gold payments. The apprehension is that the Government will suspend gold payments, that gold will go to a premium, and by the very force of circumstances the country will be precipitated to a silver basis.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have but five minutes.

Now, that is precisely the question, precisely the idea, that I desire to convey in this connection, and I repeat that for all practical purposes this country was upon a gold standard from 1850 to 1860; and I further say, that in a Democratic Congress in 1853, when George S. Houston, a distinguished Alabamian, was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a bill was reported for the coinage of subsidiary silver coins, and that the members of that committee stated upon the floor of this House that the country was then practically upon a gold standard, and it was the purpose of the committee in reporting the bill to keep it on a gold standard, and to make silver subsidiary to gold. [Applause.]

[Mr. SWANSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Chairman, this bill, or this substitute, and all the amendments proposed that I have heard, proceed upon the assumption that the American people are willing to decree the payment of all their debts, both public and private, at 50 cents on the dollar, or else it assumes that this Government of ours has the power to so monetize silver as to make 50 cents' worth of it equal in value to 100 cents. The first assumption, I believe, no honorable man will stand upon for a single moment. The second assumption depends upon the power of government to monetize a metal. I deny that there exists in any organized government under God's sun the power to monetize or demonetize any given substance which mankind chooses for its medium of exchange. [Applause.] No emperor, prince, or potentate, no legislative body can ever accomplish that. God grant that we might have such power. God grant that this Congress might make 50 cents worth 100. I would like it first-rate. [Laughter.] That old curse of Adam, which I first realized in my childhood, that "by the sweat of thy face shalt thou earn thy bread," has always been a stumbling-block to me throughout my life. [Laughter.] But the American Congress can not repeal that decree, and, on the whole, I do not know that it ought to be repealed, though personally I have always wished it out of the way. [Laughter.]

No, Mr. Chairman; mankind, when it wants a medium of exchange, selects the commodity which the greatest number of people desire. Massachusetts selected its codfish; on the banks of the Potomac tobacco and whisky were the circulating media of exchange at one time. As our civilization advanced we have seen selected as a medium of exchange from time to time that commodity which has best served our purposes and the purposes of an advancing civilization, until we have reached the gold standard. We have looked patiently and industriously for years to find out the rascally conspirators who committed the "crime of 1873" [laughter]; and we have looked in vain. And when my friends find those gentlemen they will be very close upon the heels of those colonial conspirators who demonetized codfish on the shores of Massachusetts Bay, and demonetized whisky and tobacco on the Potomac and the Chesapeake. [Laughter.] One was demonetized on precisely the same principle that the other was demonetized. And when mankind finds something better than gold it will adopt that for its standard.

I have heard something in this debate about the cost of the gold standard. Have any of you figured the cost to this nation of the silver craze. The report of the Director of the Mint tells us that we have purchased since 1878 about 600,000,000 ounces of silver, costing about 78 cents on the dollar. To-day that is worth 50 cents or a little less.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I should like a little more time.

Mr. LACEY. I ask that my colleague be allowed five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Chairman, we have already lost because of the difference between 78, the price at which we purchased that silver, and 48 or 49, its present value, something like $175,000,000, which has been paid to the silver miners alone. Every dollar's worth of silver bullion that has been bought since 1878 and coined and put into circulation has got to be redeemed ultimately by this Government of ours or it will be covered with dishonor. If I had time to make the calculation I could show that this silver legislation has cost this country over a thousand million dollars. In the infamous bond purchase of last year we could, but for the silver craze, have made those bonds which the President issued payable specifically in gold, and he informed this House that if he had had that authority $16,000,000 and upward could have been saved. We were receiving gold on that loan. Is there an honest man in the United States who expects to pay that loan in anything other than the best money in the world—the money which was received for it? I do not believe there is.

I repeat, the cost of the silver craze has exceeded one thousand million dollars, and it all comes from one fundamental error; that is the idea that Congresses and Presidents can add anything to the value of any commodity on earth.

Silver has not been demonetized. Even public opinion has not demonetized silver, for when the act of 1873 was passed there was not in circulation over $50,000,000 of silver. I think there was almost none in circulation at that time. To-day we have in circulation, either in the form of silver dollars or of fractional silver, or of silver certificates, some four hundred or five hundred million dollars. The talk about the demonetization of silver is arrant nonsense and is entirely outside of the scope of truth.

Gentlemen say that we want more money. So we do. So does every nation seeking its material prosperity want more money. How are we to get it? Not by decreeing that 50 cents shall be worth 100, but by setting to work all the vast industrial forces of this great country at profitable employment. [Applause.] Stop sending our money to Europe for those things which we can produce ourselves. [Applause.] Use all the vast resources which nature's God has possessed us with. Put every pair of willing hands in the United States at work at profitable employment, and we can make a stream of gold flow into the lap of our country from every gold mine and every commercial nation throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I can but esteem it fortunate that we are not reduced to the alternative of choosing between those two children of evil—the alleged bond bill as it passed the House, and the Senate substitute that we are now considering. I congratulate the country that the assured defeat of the one will result in the speedy demise of both. Neither of them, in my judgment, was intended to serve any useful purpose; and both of them in their way are alike calculated to injuriously affect the credit of the country. The bonds provided for in the first were meant to be paid in gold, but shrunk from declaring its purpose in the text. It meant covertly and by indirection to retire the greenbacks without providing a substitute to take their place, but had not the courage to declare its meaning to the world.

The bill passed by this House providing for a 3 per cent five-year bond, had it been crystallized into law, would have yet left upon the statute books another law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury in an emergency to place on the market a long-time higher-rate bond. Hence, it seems to me, it would have been absolutely sure that had the proposed low-rate short-term bond been offered by the Government the market, realizing the necessities of the Government, knowing that it had only to refuse that bond in order to get the most advantageous bond that the Government was authorized to sell, would have declined to bid for the first in order to get a chance to name its own terms upon the last.

It seems to me the Republican managers on this floor did realize the utter, the sheer impossibility of disposing of the bonds for which their bill attempted to provide, inasmuch as they failed to provide for a repeal of the law of 1875, thus making it plain that for a temporary partisan advantage they were willing to force the Government of the United States to offer the market a bond that could not be sold and to see it humiliated by the failure to sell its own bonds in its own market.

But, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, your contemporaries of the Senate, realizing the situation, have seen your play and gone you at least one better. They have swept aside the farce with which you attempted to impose on the country, under the guise of patriotic legislation, and substituted in its stead a tragedy of graver import. How that result was accomplished is a matter of but small moment. What an analysis of the roll call upon the passage of the bill we are considering as the substitute of the Senate would reveal is a matter of no vital importance. The world does not interest itself very much in roll calls. It looks only to results. It sees the Republican party in control of that Senate—the Republican party that is the vaunted champion of honest money—deliberately trading off the great coinage committee of that body to the Populists in exchange for a few petty doorkeepers and pages to satisfy the rapacity of some lean and hungry followers. [Applause.]

It sees that party able to secure the votes necessary to capture a few miserable offices, but utterly unable to get votes enough to secure for the people helpful legislation. [Applause.] It sees that once august body—once the greatest tribunal on this earth—now under Republican control, delibetately and complacently following the leadership—the brutal leadership—of one who, describing himself as a farmer, finds a fitter correlation with the farmer's small lieutenant, the bug that bears his burden backward.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, to this complexion has it come at last. Our country in peril, our credit menaced, and yet a day or two ago I heard the gifted gentleman from Iowa crying out to his discontented party associates, "Write no new party law; sit supinely down; an election approaches; do nothing now that might imperil the chances of the Republican party to control the offices for the next four years."

Mr. Chairman, I take it, with many others who have debated on this floor the pending question, that all the time and all the words, that all the eloquence and all the invectives delivered upon the subject has been time wasted. I say wasted because, while I would not assume to affirm the faith of any man, yet I can not bring myself to believe that there is upon the floor of this House, or upon the floor of either House of this Congress, one single individual who, in his heart, believes that in the absence of an agreement among the nations the mints of the United States will ever again be open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. And why should he believe it? Why should he expect this nation, greatest now of all earth, a nation able to cope with the world in arms—why should he expect such a country as that to deliberately turn away from its associations with the great mercantile and industrial nations of the earth and voluntarily array itself with the almost semibarbarous nations of the world that are without influence as they are without trade.

In my judgment the party that to-day binds itself to the dead body of free silver need not hope for the confidence of the country for a quarter of a century, no matter what its course may hereafter be. I do not believe the Democratic party will ever commit itself to such an inexcusable folly. I regret immeasurably that in this matter I must part from and differ with a number of my party associates and friends upon this floor. But while I differ with them I have no quarrel with them. Their purpose is as honest, their means of information perhaps greater; but I can not consent that their conclusions are sounder or so likely to receive the assent of the party that we together represent.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that that party, when it meets this year in convention, may meet beneath the impending shadows of defeat. But, sir, it may be in the accomplishment of some wise purpose if it can meet even under the shadows of assured defeat, undazzled by the hope of success, and yet unawed by the prospects of disaster. It will meet, I believe, in the months to come, and build a platform, safe and broad, upon which, in the years to follow, it can and will appeal to the conservative intelligence of the people, an intelligence which, in my judgment, must of necessity control the future of this country. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I was very much surprised in looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday to find that a colleague of mine [Mr. DE ARMOND] had expressed himself very indignantly and very bitterly against me on account of an address that I had delivered, I believe, on last Saturday. He uses the names Benedict Arnold and Judas Iscariot in a very indirect way, without the apparent courage to make a personal application. It would have been far more complimentary to his courage, if he intended me personally, to have used the language directly. He seems to desire to create the impression that I am a Washington convert to the sound-money doctrine, that I have come here to Washington and within the period of the last month or two become a convert to this doctrine.

I think the gentleman read enough of the papers of our State to know that during the last spring and summer I had a standing challenge in my State to meet any man upon the stump, in Missouri, in favor of the sound-money doctrine. Not only that, but that I did meet every comer who was willing to have a joint discussion in my State on the stump.

The gentleman says that I mean to charge my Democratic, Republican, or Populist colleagues on the floor of this House with personal corruption. Nothing was ever further from my intention. There is no body of men that I have ever been associated with in the period of the last three years toward whom I have a kindlier personal regard than the members of the Fifty-third and the members of the Fifty-fourth Congresses. I have no charges to make against them personally. I desire nothing more strongly than their good will. But why should the gentleman feel that he had been hit? I made no reference to him in my remarks. I called no names. Then why should he make a personal attack on me? I can not answer the question, unless the solution is to be found in the old adage that the "hit bird flutters." I know of no other explanation.

The gentleman then goes into the realm of making an attack upon me on account of what, as he charges, appears in the newspapers, and he says that I fail or refuse to answer them.

That is as to my connection, if any it may be called, with the income-tax legislation of the Fifty-third Congress. I have nothing to conceal with regard to that matter, have never desired to conceal anything. The statement that I now make is one in which the older members, especially those who were not rushing to the front and claiming the credit for matters that they had no credit or connection with, will bear me out, and is as follows:

When I first came to the Fifty-third Congress I am confident that I talked with as many as a dozen, and probably eighteen, of the leading Democrats of the House upon the importance of income-tax legislation. I found a perfect lethargy. Nobody desired to take hold of it in any form or shape. When I would speak to an old leader of the party or an old member of Congress of any party with regard to the matter, the reply seemed always to be one way, that there was no hope for such legislation. I then went to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and asked for a hearing before that body. It was accorded me, and I had the honor of appearing before the Committee on Ways and Means. I believe, as far as I am able to find out, it was the first time that that matter was agitated in any committee or on the floor of the House. My argument was something like an hour and a half or two hours in length. I went to the expense of having it printed and circulated among the members of the House. I did not desire to push myself forward, because I did not want the hostility of the older members, which always rises against a new member who tries to push himself forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALL. I do not know that I will abuse the patience of the House that long. The next thing I knew in connection with the matter I received a communication from the editor of the New York Forum, who asked me to contribute an article to that journal in favor of the income tax. I contributed the article. I suppose that it is not improper for me to say in this connection that the editor in his letter stated that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had referred him to me as being the one who would be most likely to contribute an article satisfactory to him of the kind that he desired.

The article appeared in the number of the Forum in which the income tax was opposed by Mr. David A. Wells, my article being in favor of the bill. Then the Cotemporary Club, a very able, a very learned literary organization of the city of Philadelphia, asked me to deliver a lecture upon this question at its annual meeting. This I did; and in this connection the papers noted my name and my action and my work in this matter. I argued the matter before members of the Cabinet and everybody that I could get to listen on that important question; and I did with it as I have done in everything that I felt interested in, worked in every way possible to forward the matter. Now, the gentleman takes these facts I have stated and says I am pluming myself upon borrowed feathers. That I believe is all the explanation I desire to make. I make it because he seems to have thought I was making a personal attack upon him, when no thought of him ever entered my mind.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, now that the gentleman, my colleague [Mr. HALL], has been caught in his seat [applause], that I am not responsible for his having been out of his seat when I made the comments to which he has just taken exception. Neither do I feel that anything that the gentleman said "struck" me, nor was I conscious of "fluttering." But as one of the Representatives from the State of Missouri I felt when I spoke before that when this newest convert from that State to the so-called sound-money doctrine saw fit, as my colleage did in making formal proclamation upon the floor of this House of his momentous conversion, to talk about the "Chinese," "the people from the East Indies," and from the "depths of Africa," and "the lower animals" as typical creatures in the category of those who do not change their opinions, perhaps it was not inappropriate to suggest that there might be changes of opinion—and I think there are and have been such changes—which would evidence no tremendous exaltation in the transformed one above some of those classes thus referred to. [Laughter.] I felt that the gentleman's insinuation might be understood abroad, if allowed to go unchallenged on this floor, as a reflection upon the true men who have honored and trusted him and me; and I felt, as a loyal Missourian, proud of my State, proud of the people who have honored me, and proud of the people who have honored him (mistakenly, I think), that I ought not, in justice to them, to allow his remarks to pass without notice.

As to the income-tax business, I say again that the gentleman has paraded himself and allowed himself to be paraded as the author of the income-tax measure, when he knows he was not, and I call upon everybody here who has read the newspapers, everybody who knows anything about the gentleman's pretenses and something about the facts, to bear witness to the truth of my statement. The gentleman himself has not denied it.

I have no doubt that the gentleman "spoke to perhaps eighteen of the older members," as he now claims. For, of course, I remember well, and so do all who were here then, that when the gentleman came to Congress he spoke about many things, in season and out of season, to this man and to that man, to every man who would give him audience, as though he were the man who understood all these things, and the only man who understood them. [Laughter.]

I know—everybody here knew—that the gentleman was plenteous and prompt with his advice; that he assumed, as far as he could assume, all the guidance and conduct of public affairs, which assumption, according to his presumption, must have been most valuable. I know that the gentleman was held aloft by the gentleman himself as the one man not only in this country, but in this wide, wide world, who had read everything, studied everything that had been written upon the income tax, and who knew all about it; that he was the one man upon whom the progress of income-tax legislation must rest. [Laughter and applause.] I submit to the recollection and the observation and the judgment of those who served with him as to the facts.

He stated in his "lower animals" speech (he does not refer to it now) that he had been informed and believed that as many as eight Senators who voted for the passage of the substitute now before us had said that they believed free-silver legislation would bring bankruptcy and ruin upon the country. He did not identify them. He has not yet named one. He dare not do it; he never will do it.

The gentleman talks about me attacking him because he was out. Let him now name a Senator; they were not here when he spoke. Let him name one of them. Let him name the person who stated that a single Senator ever said anything like what he says came to him about these Senators. My belief is that not one man who has a seat in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol ever said any such a thing as that reported to the House by my colleague.

I simply referred to this matter before, and now refer to it again, because I saw in the papers of the State of Missouri that this gentleman in his speeches last summer told the people how he had seen the light and had risen above the common level upon which others are acting; but that, having been sent here as an advocate of free silver, having been elected upon a free-silver platform, having pledged himself to vote for and advocate free silver here, he would vote for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HARTMAN asked unanimous consent that Mr. DE ARMOND have five minutes more.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Referring to this incident of the Senators, I merely said that if eight Senators, or one Senator, had made any such remark as my colleague attributed to them, they had merely done what the gentleman himself does not, and will not, and dare not deny that he has done. So much I said in my little speech, which, it seems, the gentleman does not indorse—said it to let the Senators down easy after the gentleman had assailed them if they needed "letting down." So much to make lighter and easier the fall, if there was no way of escaping it, since the gentleman had heard certain things about them. [Laughter.] I repeat that I do not believe they ever said it. I do not believe the gentleman will ever open out the information upon which he rests his statement. I do not believe he will ever name the Senators, or one Senator; but I repeat once more that if they said what the gentleman says they did say, they merely did what it is reported over and over again that he has done, said what he does not now deny that he made a business of saying.

I said, in speaking of this matter, that the people whom the gentleman represents and those whom I represent are not a besotted and ignorant people; that they are not a people dependent for guidance upon the politicians who go around among them, especially politicians of the gentleman's stamp and kind. [Laughter.] I said that those people, honest, brave, truthful, steadfast, have admiration for those qualities when they find them in others; and I said that anyone who had used language which might be understood, by those who do not know these good people, as carrying the suggestion that they are an inferior people was certainly doing them a very grave injustice and was engaged in a most unsavory business himself. These people, Mr. Chairman, do not need defense unless they need to be defended on account of the misapprehension, the misunderstanding, the mistake, which led them to send the gentleman to the Halls of Congress. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman, in his remarks the moment before I rose, said something about Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold. I do not stand here to defend those historic characters. I let them go.

The gentleman talked about Gladstone. If I had chosen I might have commented upon the exquisite modesty that resides in my colleague when, in talking about his own conversion, his own elevation, his own progress, he thrust into such close connection with that great event the little incident about the change in the opinions of Mr. Gladstone. [Great laughter.] I might, if I chose to do so, speak of what he said about Bismarck, the great, imperial genius of the German Empire, one of the marked men of this century and of all the world. [Laughter.]

I might, if I chose, comment upon the modesty which prompted the gentleman to associate himself and his change of front with that great man, and some alleged change in his opinions. [Laughter.] But I merely said, in passing, what I say now, that any man has a right to change his opinions and it is no other man's business. But my impression was, and is now, and it has been greatly strengthened, that when a man changes his opinions and departs from his old associates upon some great question, he ought hardly to prate, at the first opportunity, about the "courage" which led him to reverse himself, or talk about the "cowardice" (without identification or specification) that, according to his impudent assumption, resides in those who do not do likewise; or talk about the "Chinese" and the "lower animals" as being typical of those who do not change when he does. [Laughter.] My impression is, my impression was, that such an exhibition is hardly in extra good taste, and I do not feel that I greatly transgressed the rules of this House or of propriety when I called attention to these things. [Laughter.]

I do not know whether any of the gentleman's chaste and tasty references will appear in his speech of last Saturday when he gets it into the RECORD, for the speech is still held back for revision, and is not yet in the RECORD. As to one of those references, that about people "feathering their nests," I do not know just what he meant; but I venture to say that if feathers are to be had for the asking, or for the plucking, the gentleman, if he is around, will get his full share if he is able to get it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HALL obtained the floor.

Mr. BRUMM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. My inquiry is whether we must take the vote at 4 o'clock, notwithstanding the time taken up in these personal explanations?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I shall object to the time being thus occupied.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. HALL. Am I recognized, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HALL] has the floor.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reiterate that I do not wish at all to emulate this gentleman in billingsgate; I do not expect to equal him in it. In this slough he seems to be at home, and he must flounder alone. But I wish to reply in a brief manner to some matters to which he has referred.

He comes forward here and states that he is representing the people of my district and the people of his own district as well when he is declaring against the utterances that I made on this floor. I desire to call his attention to the fact that we have but five Democrats here from Missouri instead of fourteen in the Fifty-third Congress; that of those five Democrats, three of us are sound money men [applause], and that the leader of the 16 to 1 idea in the United States is now at home upon his rocky farm in Laclede County unless he is still lecturing to his one-man audiences in the South. [Laughter and applause.]

I desire to say further, in connection with the remark that the gentleman has drawn out with regard to the United States Senators, that the statement I made upon the floor of this House was made for the purpose of illustrating a broad proposition; it was made for the purpose of "pointing a moral" and enforcing this truth—and there are few intelligent men in the United States who have reached the age of 21 years who do not know it to be true—that public men, not in this body merely, or in the Senate, or in the State legislatures alone, but that all public men generally, are guilty of cowardice toward the people in the treatment of the great public. I gave that illustration for the purpose of pointing the moral and bringing out the truth more fully; and instead of retracting or modifying the statement I take this occasion to reassert the same proposition with greater emphasis and force than ever, so that it may be vividly brought before the people of the United States.

A MEMBER. Name the men.

Mr. HALL. I have this further to say: I did not make that statement with the intent and purpose of bringing into public view the communications or conversations, some public, some private, that led me to make the statement; nor do I recognize the right of any man on this floor to demand of me to bring into public notoriety the means by which this matter has been brought to my notice. If men choose to read the periodicals, there are periodicals extant in which you can find the expressions of some of the gentlemen to whom I referred. But I made my statement for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the people of the United States that crying evil; and I reiterate it for that very same purpose. [Applause.]

I wish to say to the gentleman that I am not called upon to answer to him or his constituents for my course in Congress. I propose to go back to my district and make the fight for sound money. [Applause.] He will go to his and make the fight for silver monometallism. Let the election next November show which is right, which represents the brain, the brawn, and the intelligence of the rural districts of Missouri, by showing whether the name "DE ARMOND" or "HALL" will be called when the roll of the Fifty-fifth Congress is made up. [Applause.] I have unlimited confidence in the honesty, the uprightness, the integrity, and the brains of my people. I believe they will sustain me; I believe that I shall receive their indorsement, and that the gentleman will come back (if he comes back at all) with less than the 91 majority that he received in the last election. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for taking the vote on the question of concurrence, as agreed upon in the House, be extended until five minutes past 4 o'clock, and that of the time remaining the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] have the first five minutes, and that I be allowed the last.

Mr. KEM. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order has been called for; but the Chair was about to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that, as the order in reference to taking the vote was made in the House, it could not, in the opinion of the Chair, be changed in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly that point is well taken. Now, does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] wish to occupy a part of the remaining time?

Mr. TOWNE. I do not care to occupy any more time. Let the gentleman from Maine proceed, if he wishes, and then let us have a vote on this proposition on its merits.

Mr. DINGLEY. There are now six minutes remaining. The gentleman from Minnesota might occupy three minutes.

Mr. TOWNE. I do not care to occupy any further time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I desire to be recognized to close this debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the first objection to this amendment is the same that has presented itself against all other amendments that have been offered, that if the House should concur with the amendment it would recede from and set aside all that it did six weeks ago. I take it for granted that it is the intention of the majority which passed the bill that went from this House to insist further upon it. Therefore, even if we were prepared to accept as an independent proposition the amendment which has been proposed, it could not be accepted without setting aside the House bill.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the provisions of this amendment, whose merits I think would not necessarily be considered in the vote which may be given. The proposition is that when the Governments of the United States, France, and Germany shall enter into an agreement for an international arrangement the mints of these countries, after such arrangement has been made, shall then be opened to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1.

My first suggestion is this practical one: If we go into a conference with the leading commercial nations of the world, or such as may in response to our invitation enter into the conference, in order to accomplish the end we have in view we must enter into it with no previous obligation as to the ratio of coinage. We must be prepared to say to the nations that we ask to join us in the conference, "We are ready to enter into an international agreement on any ratio that you will agree with us in adopting for the purpose of bringing on a world-wide bimetallism."

If we go in pledged to one particular ratio we enter at a disadvantage, and whatever proposition we have to make will be met by objections from various quarters. Nothing can be clearer than that whenever an international conference convenes, as I trust and believe one will convene in the next year, that it should be free to look over the whole question of the ratio which can be adopted and maintained, after having examined it, without any previous arrangement, and that it shall be prepared to concur at that time and go forward to the end desired.

It is therefore premature, in my judgment, to undertake to indicate to any conference what ought to be the ratio. More than that, I fear it is not possible, even with every nation in the world concurring, under the present conditions of silver production of the world, to maintain under unlimited coinage the relative value of silver and gold at the ratio of 15½ to 1, so as to secure the concurrent circulation of both metals. All the nations of the world, I fear, can not accomplish that at the ratio of 15½ to 1, unless the conditions of gold and silver production shall be materially changed. What the ratio may be that could be maintained by international agreement I am not prepared to say. It is somewhere between 16 to 1 and the present commercial ratio. No man is wise enough to-day to indicate it. It must be the result of conference and deliberation upon the facts existing all over the world and the result of a comparison of views.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRUMM. I demand the regular order. Let us have a vote on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TOWNE), there were—ayes 53, noes 146.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRUMM. I hereby give notice that I will ask for a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will not be pending in the House, having been rejected in committee.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], to agree to the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were—ayes 80, noes 190.

So the motion to concur was rejected.

[The announcement of the vote was received with applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The result of the vote is that the committee agree to recommend to the House that the amendment of the Senate be nonconcurred in.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise and report that recommendation to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2904, had instructed him to recommend to the House nonconcurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to repeat the notice I gave at the commencement of the session to-day, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] desires to avail himself of the privilege of the rules of the House, before the previous question shall be moved, to speak in favor of the motion for concurrence in the House. That after one hour, or such time as he may see fit to occupy to-morrow, those members of the Committee on Ways and Means who are opposed to the Senate amendment will avail themselves of the same time in reply; immediately after which I shall move the previous question on the recommendation of the committee for nonconcurrence in the Senate amendment.

I move that the House do now adjourn.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—VAN HORN VS. TARSNEY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withhold that motion for a moment until I can make a report from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will withdraw the motion temporarily.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections No. 2 to present to the House the report in the contested-election case of Robert T. Van Horn against John C. Tarsney from the Fifth Congressional district of Missouri. The report is concurred in by all the members of the committee on the main question; but on the application of Mr. Tarsney to open up the case and take additional testimony, some few gentlemen dissent from the views of the committee and desire time in which to submit their views in writing, which I am assured will be at the earliest practicable moment. As soon as these views are filed I shall give notice of a day on which the House will be asked to consider the case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to say to him that he is mistaken in saying that the whole committee have agreed upon that report, either as to the main question or as to the question of reopening the case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if I have done any injustice to any member of the committee I certainly am sorry for it.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the gentleman did not mean to do so, and therefore I made my statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will say this in justification of myself, however, that if the gentleman did not concur in the main report, then I am certainly utterly unable to understand the force and effect of human language as used by him in the committee room.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly satisfied that the gentleman did not intend to misrepresent me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Certainly not. I certainly understood the gentleman as I have stated.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply desire my statement to go into the RECORD along with his. This much is true: The entire committee agreed that the case, as made up, could only be decided as the majority have decided it, but the committee——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I drew the report, and I certainly do not intend to commit the gentleman to my reasoning.

Mr. BAILEY (continuing). But the minority insists that the case is not properly made up, and we could not agree to the conclusion of the committee on the main question, because we think the collateral question was not properly decided. In other words, the position of the minority is simply this: We think the committee's conclusion is correct from their premises, but we think their premises incorrect, and therefore their conclusion is wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The gentleman's distinctions are so subtle that I do not care to waste any time in discussing them.

Mr. BAILEY. I am content, however, to have those distinctions go into the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I will say again I certainly do not intend to commit the gentleman to my reasoning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2, makes the report which has been presented to the House; which will be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I should like to ask gentlemen of the minority who desire to present their views how long a time they desire?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] has agreed to prepare the minority report. I see the gentleman from California is in his seat, and he will speak for himself.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I did not hear the first part of the discussion. I presume it relates to the matter of the report in the Van Horn-Tarsney case?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Yes. I inquired how long the gentlemen of the minority desire in which to present their written views to the House.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I suppose you can give us until Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks consent to file, by Tuesday next, the views of the minority.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I see no objection. That seems to be a reasonable time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 1717) to grant to the city of Charleston, S. C., the use of certain real estate in said city on which is situated the building known as The Exchange—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LINNEY, for seven days, from February 14, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUFF, for the remainder of this week, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. DINGLEY (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, February 14, 1896, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 14, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call up House bill 2904, the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. The question before the House is on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole for nonconcurrence. Before moving the previous question, the gentleman from Georgia will take the floor for an hour.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the important question now before the House, I shall endeaver to confine myself to a citation of such facts and such illustrations as I think bear upon the subject; and I shall carefully refrain from saying anything or intimating anything calculated to wound or hurt the feelings of any other member of the House. This is an economic question; and no matter what views gentlemen may have entertained in the past, I should assume, and do assume, that every member when he casts his vote to-day casts it conscientiously and honestly in accordance with the views that he now entertains.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to overrun the time which has been assigned me, and the chief difficulty I have is to select from the great mass of matter which might be presented that which is most pertinent and that which is least old, if such an expression may be tolerated.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important subject, and I ask unanimous consent that my colleague shall have as much time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that his colleague shall have as much time as he desires. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRISP. I thank my colleague and I thank the House; but notwithstanding, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavor, if possible, to confine myself to the hour prescribed by the rules of the House.

In 1873 the Congress of the United States passed an act demonetizing silver. Now, even that proposition seems to be disputed.

If it were possible that as we progress in the argument we could agree upon something, could agree upon some facts, then we might so narrow the issue as to make it more plain and comprehensible, but it seems impossible to do even this.

Now, I assert that in 1873 silver was demonetized. That is, we ceased to coin it, and the unlimited legal-tender quality was taken from it.

Again I assert, Mr. Speaker, that from the year 1792 down to the hour of the passage of the act of 1873 we were on a bimetallic basis or standard in the United States. Here again there seems to be some dispute. This dispute, Mr. Speaker, is of modern origin. Never was it contended until lately; but now we find the advocates of a single gold standard contending that notwithstanding since 1792 there had been a statute which authorized the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at a fixed ratio, and provided that each or either coin might be used in the payment of all debts, public and private, that, nevertheless, we never had bimetallism in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the confusion that arises, I respectfully submit, upon that question is in not drawing a distinction between a standard of value and a circulating medium. That there is a difference there can be no doubt. I quote from President Cleveland's last annual message:

There is a vast difference between a standard of value and a currency for monetary use.

In 1792 we established a mint. The act provided that—

Every 15 pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with 1 pound weight of gold, and that all the gold and silver coin which has been struck at and issued from the mints shall be a legal tender in all payments whatsoever.

That, Mr. Speaker, I submit is bimetallism. That is the kind of bimetallism for which the Democratic party has always contended, a bimetallism which permits the free and equal coinage of the two metals at the mint upon a ratio fixed by law, and which authorizes the payment of debts, public and private, with the coin so struck at the mint. Some of our friends say that from 1792 to 1834 there was but little gold in circulation in the United States, and therefore we were on a silver basis. But no man can dispute, Mr. Speaker, that at that time we had in the United State a double standard. What I mean by a double standard is that there were two kinds of coin which were freely and without limit struck at the mint, in either of which all debts, public and private, might be lawfully paid; and the fact that our metallic circulation may have been principally silver at that time in no way militates against the idea that we were on a bimetallic basis. What do gentlemen understand a bimetallic basis to be? A bimetallic basis is one which links together gold and silver coin, so that the aggregate amount of the two in the world regulates throughout the world the prices of things. Lest it may be said that this is a definition or a suggestion coming from one unskilled in financial matters, permit me to read from a statement from Baron Rothschild.

The simultaneous employment of the two precious metals is satisfactory, and gives rise to no complaint. Whether gold or silver dominates for the time being, it is always true that the two metals concur together in forming the monetary circulation of the world, and it is the general mass of the two metals combined which serves as the measure of the value of things.

Our friends tell us that from 1834 to 1860 the principal metal in circulation in this country was gold, and therefore we were then on a gold standard. Mr. Speaker, so long as the law provides for the free and equal coinage of the two metals you can not be upon a single standard. The principal part of your metallic circulation may be of either coin, but your entire circulation is based upon both coins, and values are regulated by the amount of both that exist as money in the world.

Our friends insist upon too much. When they say the circulation of a country is necessarily the standard of value therein, they overlook the fact that the general plane of prices is fixed by the amount of primary money existing in the world, and not by the amount in any one country of the world. There might be a circulation in the United States of paper, in Great Britain of gold, in France of silver, yet, so long as some great nation or several great nations by opening their mints to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at a fixed ratio maintained the commercial and coinage parity of both, the measure of values throughout the world would be the combined quantity of the two metals.

My good friend from Tennessee, Mr. PATTERSON, contends that from 1850 to 1860 this country was on the gold standard. It is necessary, or rather it is desirable, from the standpoint of the gentleman that he should establish that fact, because that was, perhaps, the most satisfactory era in the history of the country in respect to the increase of its wealth. But the gentleman bases his whole argument upon the circumstance that the principal metallic currency during that time was gold. My friend forgets, in the language of the President, that "there is a vast difference between a standard of value and a currency for monetary use."

Now let us look briefly at the effect of demonetization. All around me there are gentlemen on both sides of the House who insist that law can not create values, who insist that nothing that we may do here can have any effect upon the value of silver bullion or upon the value of gold bullion. To gentlemen who entertain that view, of course it is idle to talk, but to gentlemen who will take a plain, practical view of things, it seems to me it is "sticking in the bark" to say that law can not affect values.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that if this Congress should say that the price of any given commodity should be a certain sum that act of Congress would be absolutely futile. But law may enhance the value of things by increasing the demand for them. Law may diminish the value of things by diminishing the demand for them. That proposition surely can not be disputed by any gentleman who will pause and think about it. Money is the one thing in this life for which all men contend. The demand for money is the sum of the demand for all things else on earth. A metal that is made money by law by one great nation becomes in demand by all the peoples in the wide world. Therefore, the law which makes that metal money at the same time puts it in a position where the demand for it becomes such that necessarily it is increased in value.

The same gentlemen who contend that law can not create value vehemently insist that they are in favor of an international agreement between the great nations of Europe and the United States respecting the coinage of silver. If law can not create value, I might ask how an international agreement between the nations of the earth could affect the value of the silver bullion. Any international agreement that might be entered into must be enforced at last by the law in the nations which might enter into it. How is it, then, that if law can not affect values that an international agreement can do so? How is it that the platform of one of the great parties of this country insists on the maintenance of the parity between the two metals by an international agreement or the safeguards of legislation? What did we mean, Mr. Speaker, when we said to the people that we favored the maintenance of the parity between gold and silver by an international agreement, if an international agreement could not put silver on a parity with gold?

All fair men must admit that it is possible to maintain the parity of the two metals by an agreement between the great commercial nations of the earth. So that the contention that law can not, in effect, establish the value of money seems to be without force and without weight.

I aver, sir, that the adoption of the single gold standard has been injurious to all the industries of the United States and to all the industries of every country adopting it. I shall cite extracts from remarks of distinguished men on this question. I shall do so because in stronger terms than I can employ they have described the disastrous effects of the striking down as a primary money of one of the great metals of the world so used for ages.

Senator SHERMAN, on July 11, 1876, in the Senate, referring to the law of Germany, said:

The enormous effect of the law in Germany, and as a consequence the partial demonetization of silver coins, I suppose, is felt by every man, woman, and child who buys or sells anything. A struggle for the possession of gold at once arose between the great nations, because anybody could see that if $3,200,000,000 of silver coin was demonetized and $3,500,000,000 of gold coin made the sole standard, it would enormously add to the value of gold, and the Bank of France, the Bank of England, and the Imperial Bank of Germany at once commenced grasping for gold in whatever form. Therefore, what we have observed recently is not so much a fall of silver as it is a rise of gold, the inevitable effect of a fear of the demonetization of silver.

That, Mr. Speaker, was Senator SHERMAN in 1876. You will observe that he says what has been so vehemently denied during this discussion that a great struggle of European nations for gold followed the demonetization of silver. That the striking down of one of the metals—one of the money metals of the world—is felt by every man, woman, or child who buys or sells anything; that the effect has been to appreciate the value of gold, which our friends on the other side so strongly deny, and that the disparity of the metals caused thereby is the result rather of a rise in gold than a fall in silver.

Senator GEORGE of Mississippi, in a speech delivered last summer, said:

In the first place, in the very year of its consummation in 1873, occurred one of the most disastrous panics that ever afflicted mankind. Cotton fell from the date of its passage in February to the end of the year, though the crop marketed was a short one, from 19¼ cents in New Orleans to 15¼, more than 4¼ cents per pound, or $22.50 per bale. This was pretty bad for a start, but it kept on falling, with only slight variations, till November 1, 1893, the date of the repeal of the Sherman law, when it reached 7⅛ cents, and then its further fall was accelerated till it reached 4¼ cents the last season. (These are New Orleans figures.) So the cotton farmer, at all events, can see how he has fared under the operation of the act of 1873. Compare 19¼ to 5¼ cents, a loss of 75 per cent nearly, and you can see the loss the farmer has sustained. He got last season a little over one-fourth the price that he got before this baleful act—this crime of all the ages, as Mr. Carlisle called it.

But it is denied that this fall was produced by demonetization. Let us see. Accurate tables of prices prepared by the best statisticians in the world, and which have been often published and never contradicted, show these convincing and unanswerable facts: That from 1850, when the money of the world was being increased by the large output of gold in California and Australia, general prices were constantly rising, so that in 1873 they were about 30 per cent higher than in 1850; and that from the very year of demonetization, 1873, they continually and persistently fell till they were lower in 1893 by between 35 and 41 per cent than in 1873. How could this happen except by and through the act committed in 1873—the demonetization of silver? Up to 1873 we had rising prices with increasing money supply, gold and silver being both used. From this very date, when money was contracting, one-half the world's money being disabled as a money metal, prices not only began to fall, but they continued to fall until a lower range of prices was reached this year than was ever known in our history.

Robert Giffen, recognized as one of the best authorities in England, said in 1888:

If events are the touchstones of prophecies, no prophecy was ever more certain than the increased dearness of gold. That the fall of prices to an extent so general as we are at present experiencing is to be referred to an increase in the purchasing power of gold is generally, and I might say almost universally, conceded.

I read again from Senator GEORGE:

In the decade 1851-1860 the cotton crop of the United States was more than doubled, yet the demand was so great that the price in 1860 was as high as it was in 1851. That was before the demonetization of silver. Now take a ten years under the influence of that baleful act, to wit, 1881-82 to 1891-92; in that decade the American crop increased only 65 per cent, though in it is included the largest crop ever grown up to that time, viz, 9,018,000 bales in 1891-92, and yet the price under the increase of only 65 per cent fell 60 per cent instead of keeping up even as it did in the first decade named, when production was increased over 100 per cent. Everybody can understand the significance of these figures.

Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, it is not so much a low price of which the world complains as it is the constant falling of prices. If prices were somewhat stationary, though low, business might continue. But where they are steadily falling, where the farmer plants his crop on the basis of the then existing price and must sell it at a lower, where the manufacturer makes his product on the basis of existing price and must sell it at a lower, where the merchant buying goods for sale to his customers must part with them at a lower price or without profit, there can be no prosperity.

Our friends say that low prices are due to modern methods, that we owe reduced prices to improved machinery, and the like. I grant that much of the cheapness of goods is due to art, invention, and science. But, Mr. Speaker, where low prices are due to improved methods, business in which such improvements are employed ought to be profitable. In other words, if the manufacturer, by reason of improved machinery, can produce goods more cheaply, his profits ought to increase. If the farmer, by reason of improved agricultural implements, can raise a crop more cheaply, the result of his operations ought to be increased profits to the farmer. I ask you, is that the case in the United States? I ask you, is that the case in any of the gold-standard countries of the world?

Let me read, Mr. Speaker, what I chanced to see in a newspaper on yesterday in relation to gold-standard England. Replying to a deputation representing agricultural interests, a few days ago, the first lord of the treasury, Mr. Balfour, informed his visitors that the Government was preparing various measures for the relief of the agricultural classes.

Mr. Balfour stated that it was his personal conviction that agriculture suffered doubly owing to the present condition of the currency, and expressed his belief that the reduced prices were largely due to the artificial appreciation of gold which followed the demonetization of silver, and secondly, to the artificial advantage given the producer in silver-using countries over the gold-using countries.

And now to those of our friends who hope for an international agreement I especially commend the last clause of this interview:

Continuing, Mr. Balfour said that the obstacles to reform did not come from abroad. They were to be found at home. Therefore it was desirable to impress the powerful interests opposing it how much the national and individual prosperity were bound up in currency reform.

That, my friends, was on the 9th of the present month. On the 11th of the present month the Queen's speech was read in Parliament, and in that speech she said:

I regret to say that the condition of agriculture is disastrous beyond recent experience. Measures will be laid before you with the object of mitigating the distress of the classes engaged in that industry.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure, whatever may be the views of members here, that the farmers of the United States will indorse the utterance, that the condition of agriculture in our country too is most deplorable, and, to use the language of the Queen, "disastrous beyond recent experience." There is no industry in the United States that prospers under a single gold standard. There can be no industry prosperous so long as we have a steady reduction of primary money and a constant contraction of our circulating medium.

Alexander Hamilton, in his report (1791) on the mint, says:

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.

William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, in a report (February 12, 1820) to Congress, says:

All intelligent writers on currency agree that when it is decreasing in amount, poverty and misery must prevail.

Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, in a report (1852) to the United States Senate, says:

Of all the great effects produced upon human society by the discovery of America, there were probably none so marked as those brought about by the great influx of the precious metals from the New World to the Old. European industry had been declining under the decreasing stock of the precious metals and an appreciating standard of values; human ingenuity grew dull under the paralyzing influences of declining profits, and capital absorbed nearly all that should have been divided between it and labor. But an increase in the precious metals, in such quantity as to check this tendency, operated as a new motive power to the machinery of commerce.

Production was stimulated by finding the advantages of a change in the standard on its side. Instead of being repressed by having to pay more than it had stipulated for the use of capital, it was stimulated by paying less. Capital, too, was benefited, for new demands were created for it by the new uses which a general movement in industrial pursuits had developed; so that if it lost a little by a change in the standard, it gained much more in the greater demand for its use, which added to its capacity for reproduction, and to its real value.

The mischief would be great, indeed, if all the world were to adopt but one of the precious metals as the standard of value. To adopt gold alone would diminish the specie currency more than one-half; and the reduction the other way, should silver be taken as the only standard, would be large enough to prove highly disastrous to the human race.

The American Review (1876) says:

Diminishing money and falling prices are not only oppressive upon debtors, of whom, in modern times, States are the greatest, but they cause stagnation in business, reduced production, and enforced idleness. Falling markets annihilate profits; and as it is only the expectation of gain which stimulates the investment of capital in operations, inadequate employment is found for labor, and those who are employed can only be so upon the condition of diminished wages. An increasing amount of money and consequently augmenting prices are attended by results precisely the contrary. Production is stimulated by the profits resulting from advancing prices; labor is consequently in demand and better paid, and the general activity and buoyancy insure to capital a wider demand and higher remuneration.

Leon Fauchet (1843), in Researches upon Gold and Silver, says:

If all the nations of Europe adopted the system of Great Britain, the price of gold would be raised beyond measure, and we should see produced in Europe a result lamentable enough.

Before a French monetary convention in 1869 testimony was given by the late M. Wolowski and by M. Rouland, governor of the Bank of France.

M. Wolowski said:

The sum total of the precious metals is reckoned at fifty milliards, one-half gold and one-half silver. If by a stroke of the pen they suppress one of these metals in the monetary service, they double the demand for the other metal to the ruin of all debtors.

M. Rouland, governor of the Bank of France, said:

We have not to do with ideal theories. The two moneys have actually coexisted since the origin of human society. They coexist because the two together are necessary, by their quantity, to meet the needs of circulation.

At the session (October 30, 1873) of the Belgian Monetary Commission, Professor Laveleye said:

Debtors, and among them the State, have the right to pay in gold or silver, and this right can not be taken away without disturbing the relation of debtors and creditors, to the prejudice of debtors to the extent of perhaps one-half, certainly of one-third. To increase all debts at a blow is a measure so violent, so revolutionary, that I can not believe that the Government will propose it, or that the Chambers will vote it.

I take it for granted that all men concede that our financial condition is unsatisfactory; that all men concede that something should be done; that all men concede that there have been errors committed in the past.

I aver, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a settled, a fixed, a determined purpose to depress silver in the markets of the world and to prevent its use as primary or standard money.

Now to the proof. In 1873, when the bullion was worth more than the coin, silver was demonetized. We ceased to coin it. What followed? There was agitation all over the country in behalf of the rehabilitation of silver. No question was so burning at that time as the restoration of silver.

In 1878 a free-coinage bill was passed. The representatives of the people desired to put the standard of value back where it had been in 1873. The bill went to the Senate. The matter was compromised. It was finally passed as the Bland-Allison law, vetoed by the Republican President (Hayes) and passed over his veto. The bill so passed was a substitute or a makeshift for the free coinage of silver.

That law provided that we should coin not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 a month. It provided that the coin issued under it should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private. How was it treated? In the first place, the minimum amount was coined. The Treasury Department, which might have coined $4,000,000, coined but $2,000,000, thereby expressing its judgments, so far as it could by its act, that coinage of silver was not desirable. The President expressed that view in his veto, and when overruled by a constitutional majority in both Houses his Secretary of the Treasury manifested his opposition by coining only the minimum amount required by the law.

The law said the silver coined under the Bland-Allison Act should be a legal tender for all debts, public and private. Our outstanding obligations, including the greenbacks, were payable in coin, and yet, according to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, from the very hour of resumption the Treasury Department transferred to the holder of the United States notes—greenbacks—the option to demand and receive gold in payment. I have heard that statement questioned, and have taken the trouble to get the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, so there can be no dispute about it. Mr. Sibley, a Representative from Pennsylvania, asked the Secretary of the Treasury a question when the Secretary appeared before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives during the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill for the year 1896, as follows:

I would like to ask you what objection there could be to having the option of redeeming either in silver or gold lie with the Treasury instead of with the note holder?

Mr. CARLISLE. If that policy had been adopted at the beginning of resumption—and I am not using this for the purpose of criticising the action of any of my predecessors, or anybody else—but if the policy of reserving to the Government at the beginning of resumption the option of redeeming in gold or silver all its paper presented, I believe it would have worked beneficially, and there would have been no trouble growing out of it; but the Secretaries of the Treasury from the beginning of resumption have pursued the policy of redeeming in gold or silver at the option of the note holders.

Now, I heard some gentleman yesterday—I do not recollect whom—say that the money under the Bland-Allison law, the silver issued under that law, stood without support and its parity was maintained because it was receivable for public dues.

Mr. Speaker, it might have been maintained in that way, but it was not. There has never been a moment from the demonetization of silver until this hour that the Treasury Department, no matter by whom administered, has manifested a friendly feeling for silver as primary money.

In 1890 the Bland-Allison law was repealed. The Sherman law was enacted, the law denounced by the national Democratic platform as a "cowardly makeshift."

Under that law we accumulated the fund of uncoined silver which is now in the Treasury. Under that law the Treasury coined some millions. Then coinage ceased. The Treasury might in the discretion of the Secretary have rapidly coined the silver bullion and redeemed the notes which were issued for its purchase; but no, only about eighteen or nineteen million dollars of the Sherman notes have been so redeemed, and the remainder, about one hundred and thirty millions, is still outstanding. But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. Shortly before August, 1893, gold coin was presented to our Treasury officials and silver dollars asked in exchange and refused.

Mark you! Gold coin presented and silver dollars asked in exchange and refused by the Treasury Department, because, Mr. Speaker, Secretary Carlisle said that "all the silver dollars in the Treasury at the time were required under the provisions of the law relating to the currency to be held in the Treasury to cover the outstanding silver certificates and the Treasury notes issued under the act of July, 1890." I read extracts from his letter to the Senate dated August 17, 1893:

4. Gold coin is issued in redemption of United States notes in sums not less than $50 by the assistant treasurers in New York and San Francisco, and in redemption of Treasury notes of 1890 in like sums by the Treasurer and all the assistant treasurers.

In further response to the resolution I have to say that recently gold coin has been presented at an office of this Department and silver dollars asked in exchange therefor, and that the exchange was not made for the reason that all the silver dollars in the Treasury at the time were required under the provisions of the laws relating to the currency to be held in the Treasury to cover outstanding silver certificates and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890. At present the Department would not and could not exchange silver dollars for gold coin if requested to do so by holders of gold for the same reason; but if the condition of the funds of the Treasury were such as to afford a margin of silver dollars in excess of silver certificates and Treasury notes outstanding, such exchanges would be made.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

He refused to give silver for gold, because he must hold the silver to pay the silver certificates and Sherman notes issued under the act of 1890, and when a Sherman note issued under the act of 1890 is presented he redeems it in gold and not in silver. [Applause.] What mockery is this! What sort of friendly treatment is accorded silver by this law and the practice that obtains at the Treasury of the United States?

Again, we have a large quantity of subsidiary silver. In Great Britain, which is a gold-standard country, they have more than $200,000,000 of subsidiary silver, which is sustained alone by its being a limited legal tender. In the United States the subsidiary silver coin is not left to stand upon its own feet. So fearful are the single gold standard advocates of the United States that silver may have some footing that in 1879 they passed an act that even subsidiary silver coin should be redeemed in lawful money when presented to the Treasury in sums of $20 and multiples thereof. You can not take subsidiary silver in England to the Treasury and have it redeemed, for there is no law requiring its redemption. In the United States the worshipers of gold are not even willing to trust silver so far as our subsidiary coinage is concerned, but have provided that even that coinage should be redeemed in gold if the holders demand it.

Such has been the treatment, Mr. Speaker, of silver in this country. Our friends point to the Bland Act, they point to the Sherman Act, as evidence that a demand for silver will not increase the price. Mr. Speaker, the advocates of the free coinage of silver have never maintained that parity could be brought about by the purchase of silver, no matter how great the purchase might be. That which will bring parity, Mr. Speaker, is use as primary money in a country of sufficient wealth and population to create a demand for every ounce of silver that can be brought to the mint. It is not the fact that you coin, but it is the right of every ounce existing to be coined, that gives it value. [Loud applause.] No matter how much your purchase may be, if you leave a surplus that surplus will regulate the price.

Our single gold standard friends say that great efforts have been made here to maintain the parity between the two metals. I desire to call your attention a little to that. In the first place, every obligation of the United States bonds or notes is payable in coin. If you gentlemen on the other side believe these obligations are payable in gold, then, my friends, you ought to be brave enough to say so, because by so doing you could save to our tax-ridden people many millions of money.

Who is so bold on that side as to maintain that the obligations of the United States are payable in gold? Who on that side will vote for the payment of the obligations and bonds of the United States in gold? I hope you will not all rise at once. [Laughter.] Every obligation is payable in coin, so denominated in the contract, so voted by the Congress of the United States, and so understood by the creditors of the United States. Why, Mr. Speaker, only last February the President negotiated a bond sale. The bankers to whom he sold the bonds said to him substantially, "Sir, if within ten days from the date of this contract you can obtain the consent of the legislative department of the Government that these bonds shall be payable in gold, then we will take them at such a rate as to save to the people of the United States in interest more than $16,000,000." And the President sent down his message, and he said substantially to the House of Representatives, "I urge you to make these bonds payable in gold, because by doing so the people will save $16,000,000," and the representatives of the people refused to make the bonds payable in gold, and the syndicate took them on the contract they had entered into with the President.

Now, Mr. Speaker, has any gentleman here the hardihood to say that when we have paid or agreed to pay $16,000,000 for the privilege of paying these bonds in silver that we have no right to so pay them? [Loud applause.] Some gentlemen here say that in the past the obligations of the United States have always been paid in gold, and therefore coin means gold, and not silver; but the gentlemen who took those bonds are estopped from such a contention as that, because they themselves raised the doubt, and said, "If you will resolve that doubt in our favor we will pay you $16,000,000"; and yet we are told we can not pay them in silver, for if we do we violate the contract; if we do we trail in the dust the honor of our country. Mr. Speaker, what an absurdity! There is no man who buys a bond of the United States who does not read upon it that it is payable in standard money of 1870, gold and silver, at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. Speaker, if we have no legal obligation to pay them, is there any moral obligation? Is there any reason why we should depart from the terms of the contract in the interest of the bondholders and the speculators of the world? Why, sir, a few days ago our condition was pitiable—absolutely pitiable. The greatest nation on earth, the greatest in commerce, in intelligence, in progress, applauded to the echo a message from the Chief Executive asserting the true American doctrine, asserting that no European power should acquire further lodgment on the American continent. [Applause.] But, Mr. Speaker, the sound of that rejoicing had hardly died away before the so-called "business interests" of the country, that class of whose patriotism we hear so much, were shaking at the knees for fear Great Britain would take our precious gold away! Can we maintain a system that leaves us in that condition and justify ourselves before a liberty-loving people? [Applause.]

Now, the question is, What is to be done? Our Republican friends say "nothing." That is the kind of Republican Congress we have got—"nothing—do nothing." [Laughter. Applause on the Democratic side.] You find your country embarrassed in the face of her enemies by laws that you yourselves have made, and, with full power to change them, you do nothing. Have we not a right to expect something from that side of the House? Is the country to be left at the mercy of the foreign money sharks because this Republican majority of 140 or 150 refuses to do anything? We on this side are helpless. This side of the House, however it may be divided on certain questions, would be glad to see something done to protect the Treasury, and at the same time protect the interests of the people.

We have paid, or obligated ourselves to pay, $262,000,000 to maintain the parity between gold and silver—obligated ourselves to pay that amount of principal, not to speak of the interest. The Secretary of the Treasury and the President tell us there is no need for that money except to procure gold, that there is no deficiency in the Treasury necessitating the issue of bonds. You gentlemen may say, and do say, that the Wilson-Gorman bill has produced a deficiency, but the President tells us, and so does the Secretary, that there is nothing in the condition of the Treasury to demand these sales of bonds except the necessity for gold. Two hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds have been sold for gold. The gold for which the earlier issues were sold has gone out into the country or abroad, and probably some of it is now coming back to pay for the later issues.

You have established by your laws—not Democratic laws, Republican laws, for I am afraid that sometimes you gentlemen forget that you are responsible for this condition of things—you have established by the laws you have passed what is called an "endless chain" which draws gold out of the Treasury. That has been done by your laws and by your method of administering the laws, which, I regret to say, has been followed by the Democratic Administration. You set the example, and the present Secretary of the Treasury says that but for the fact that you did set the example the other system might have been followed with great benefit to the country, but that, inasmuch as you did set the example of transferring the option from the Government to the holder, it was necessary that he should follow it. You are in the habit of saying, some of you gentlemen on the other side, "Why, we transferred the option because the obligation was upon us to maintain the parity between the two metals."

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the act of 1890 does declare in favor of the maintenance of the parity between the two metals; but did the Bland-Allison Act so declare? The exchange of gold or the transfer of the option was given by Republican Secretaries of the Treasury at a time when there was no legal obligation to maintain the parity between the two metals. It was a mere voluntary election on their part to surrender the rights of the people in favor of a class that was specially favored at that time and, I regret to say, since. Two hundred and sixty-two millions of dollars of bonds have been sold.

Now, what is the effect of that, apart from the cost? You recollect that our Republican friends, when they first reported their bond bill, had a provision in it which might be construed to retire the greenbacks. You recollect the fluttering that it created on that side. You recollect how anxious they all became to find out just what it meant, and you recollect the Ways and Means Committee was called together again and any ambiguity which existed in the bill was cured, so as to make it clear that the intention was not to retire the greenbacks. From that I would infer that the Republican majority in this House would not vote for a bill to retire the greenbacks; and yet, Mr. Speaker, the failure of the majority here to do something to change the existing laws does, in effect, retire the greenbacks from circulation.

Think of that a moment. We had before this last sale about $170,000,000, in round numbers, in the Treasury. About a hundred millions of it, I believe, was of that character on which gold is paid. Now, we have sold a hundred millions of bonds and we are going to get a hundred and ten millions in the Treasury for those bonds, so that when that money is received we shall have two hundred and seventy millions in the Treasury. If a hundred millions of that is gold, the remainder is greenbacks. When our friends in Europe or on Wall street want more gold they will take it from the Treasury of the United States with greenbacks, and when the gold just purchased is gone we will have $270,000,000 in greenbacks or Treasury notes in the Treasury. Two hundred and seventy millions of our greenbacks are thus locked up. Repeat that operation once or twice and every dollar of the greenback circulation of the country will be locked up in the Treasury and you will have done in a more costly way that which you would not vote to do at this hour.

Secretary Carlisle tells us in his last report that an attempt to impose taxation upon our people sufficient in amount to enable the Treasury to take up and hoard all of the legal tenders outstanding, now amounting to about $485,000,000, would be the most remarkable financial experiment of modern times. And you are permitting my friends—you are by your inaction now permitting just that thing to be done. You tax the people in a time of profound peace by bonds when there is no necessity for the money for the uses of the Government; and in that way you acquire and hoard the greenbacks in the Treasury. You contract the circulating medium to that extent. You say to the people that you do not favor the retirement of the greenbacks, and yet with power to repeal the Republican laws under which they are being retired, you carry out the policy of the leaders of this Congress and "do nothing."

Let us, Mr. Speaker, deal frankly with each other and with the people. If any man can show under existing law how it is possible to prevent the retirement of the greenbacks when the "business interests" of the country desire their retirement, let him now speak.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it is inevitable. There is no escaping from it. It is manifest to any man who gives the matter a moment's consideration. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that during last year there was a contraction in the currency of the United States outside the Treasury amounting to more than $73,000,000. Since that time, sir, there has been a sale of $100,000,000 of bonds, which will result in the piling up in the Treasury of $110,000,000 more money, which is thereby taken out of circulation, which is hoarded, which is kept there by the "friends of silver," as they call themselves, for fear that this country might get upon a silver basis. And how long will it be before the contraction thus progressing will be the full amount of the greenback? Why not coin the silver and pay the Sherman notes? Why adopt a policy of refusing to give silver for gold, and at the same time refuse to redeem in silver the notes which were given for its purchase?

My friend from Maine says that if we do anything with the silver, except to hold a dollar for each note outstanding, we are perpetrating a fraud. Mr. Speaker, the law which requires us so to hold silver is a fraud. The theory has been that one hundred millions of gold kept in the Treasury of the United States was sufficient for the redemption of the three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks. But when you deal with silver, what you call legal-tender silver or standard silver, you require that each silver certificate shall have behind it a silver dollar. Why, if you are so friendly to silver and believe it to be a money of final redemption and standard money, may not one hundred millions of silver dollars sustain three hundred and forty-six millions of silver certificates as well as one hundred millions of gold will sustain three hundred and forty-six millions of greenbacks?

Why, sir, it is manifest that the whole effort at all times has been to avoid the free coinage of silver, and at the same time to hoodwink the people into the idea that those who do so are friendly to silver. Now, the final question is, Can we alone maintain the free coinage of silver? That, at last, is the practical question. I submit that there can be no contention in any fair mind that could an international agreement be had, say between the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany, that silver and gold should be coined freely and without limit, at the ratio of 15½ to 1 or 16 to 1, that the bullion value of silver and gold coin and the coinage value of gold and silver coin would be exactly equal. I have heard it contended that the United States, from 1792 to 1834 and from 1834 to 1860 tried to keep the commercial value of gold and silver together by a ratio fixed by her laws and failed on both occasions, and hence the claim is that it is impossible, either by law or custom, to establish a parity between the coinage and the bullion ratio of the two metals.

We know, Mr. Speaker, historically, that France did maintain the ratio for seventy years, and we know that the apparent difference or real difference in this country on the two occasions mentioned arose from the fact that the ratios adopted in the United States, first 15 to 1 and then 16 to 1, in neither case fitted the ratio of France, 15½ to 1, and that the French ratio fixed the market price of both gold and silver bullion.

Now, if it be admitted that an international agreement between great commercial countries would restore the parity between gold bullion and silver bullion, then it simply becomes a question how much power must there be in the country which freely and without limit coins silver to bring it to a parity with gold. If you concede that an international agreement can do it, if you concede that four or five countries can do it, then you concede at once that law can affect values.

Secretary Manning defined the old condition of bimetallism, which some of our friends have recently discovered was not bimetallism, because the metals were not exactly of the same value. Mr. Manning says:

> The essential conditions of that old monetary order in their last analysis seem to be these:
> 1. Mints open to the public for the free coinage of gold.
> 2. Mints open to the public for the free coinage of silver.
> 3. Coined gold a full legal tender.
> 4. Coined silver a full legal tender.
> 5. Mints open to the public for the free coinage of silver and of gold.
> 6. Rated equivalence of both metals in such coinage, fixed by States powerful enough to make and keep it prevalent.

There was the old condition of things. In that day it had not been discovered that law had nothing to do with the value of a metal. In that day it had not been discovered that a double standard was, to use the language of the Secretary of the Treasury, "a physical and a metaphysical absurdity." [Applause.] No man had then found that out, but all the fathers believed that there might be such a thing as a double standard, and Mr. Jefferson himself, in writing to Hamilton, in February, 1792, says:

> I concur with you that the unit must stand on both metals.

Mr. Jefferson did not regard the double standard as a physical and metaphysical absurdity; Mr. Hamilton did not so regard it; but it is reserved for modern statesmanship to discover that the double standard, which we had for near a century and for the restoration of which we now contend, is a physical and metaphysical absurdity. When Mr. Sherman appeared before a Senate committee he said, speaking of the Bland-Allison law:

> In the first place, the silver bill satisfied a strong public demand for bimetallic money, and that demand is no doubt largely sectional. No doubt there is a difference of opinion between the West and the South and the East on the subject, but the desire for remonetization of silver was almost universal. In a Government like ours it is always good to obey the popular currents, and that has been done, I think, by the passage of the silver bill.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have been told of late that it is evidence of a want of statesmanship to follow the popular current.

Mr. WHEELER. A want of courage.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, a want of courage to follow the popular current; but this great Senator, this great statesman, who has been so long in public life, says that in a Government like ours it is always good to obey the popular current. And why should it not be? Have we forgotten that the people constitute the Government of the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. Bayard, then a Senator from Delaware, asked this question of Secretary Sherman:

> How long do you suppose this short supply of silver and your control of it by your coinage will keep it equivalent to gold, when one is worth 10 cents less than the other?

At that very time the bullion in the silver dollar was worth 10 cents less than the bullion in the gold dollar. Here is the reply:

> Just so long as it can be used for anything that gold is used for it will be worth in this country the par of gold, until it becomes so abundant and bulky that the people will become tired of carrying it about—

He does not stop there—> but in our country that can be avoided by depositing it for coin certificates.

Mr. SHERMAN does not think that there is any trouble about maintaining the parity just so long as it can be used for anything that gold is used for, and it will be worth the parity of gold in this country until it is so abundant there is trouble in carrying it about, and you can avoid that trouble by having silver certificates. That was his judgment on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN again—I quote him often because he is the father of most of this Republican legislation, and I quote admissions, as it were, against him and in our favor to show that our contention is founded in justice and right—Mr. SHERMAN in his letter to Mr. Groesbeck said that during the Paris conference he favored a single gold standard, but since that time other arguments—I quote him—"other arguments, showing the dangerous effect upon industry of dropping one of the precious metals from the standard of value, outweigh in my mind all theoretical objections to the bimetallic system." And then he says:

> I am thoroughly convinced that if it were possible for the leading commercial nations to fix by agreement an arbitrary relation between silver and gold, even though the market value might vary somewhat from time to time, it would be a measure of the greatest good to all nations.

Mr. SHERMAN concedes that the commercial nations might by agreement fix the ratio between gold and silver. Mr. Carlisle agrees to the same proposition. In 1878 Mr. Carlisle said:

I shall not enter into an examination of the causes which have combined to depreciate the relative value of silver, and to appreciate the value of gold since 1873, but I am one of those who believe that they are transient and temporary in their nature and when they have passed away—or have been removed by the separate or united actions of the nations most deeply interested in the subject, the old ratio of actual and relative value will be reestablished on a firmer foundation than ever.

"When these difficulties have been removed by the separate or united action of the nations most deeply interested in the subject." It never entered his mind that it could not be removed by united action; it never entered his mind in that day that legislation could not affect the value of money.

Now, the question is, Have we the power alone to bring to a parity the bullion value of silver and the bullion value of gold? Our gold-standard friends contend we have not, and present plausible theories in support of their contention.

We insist that we have the power. We say that what has been once done can be again done, and we cite the experience of France. In 1803 France opened her mints to the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 15½ to 1, and kept them open at that ratio for seventy years, until the Franco-Prussian war. During all that time the French ratio dictated the world's market price of silver, and during all that time practically 15½ pounds of silver bullion would purchase in the markets of the world 1 pound of gold bullion. In the ten years ending with 1810 the world's production of silver averaged fifty and a quarter times the weight of gold produced each year. Nevertheless the market price of silver was 15.6 worth 1 of gold, the French mint price being 15.5 to 1. In the ten years ending with 1855 a complete reversal of the relative production of gold and silver appears, the silver produced during this period being only four and one-half times the weight of the gold each year. But the market price of silver averaged 15.4, as against the French mint price of 15.5. These figures I take from Mr. W. P. St. John, of New York.

The National Bimetallist of December 18, 1895, in dealing with this question truthfully says:

In 1792, Hamilton advised Congress to adopt the ratio of 15 to 1. He arrived at that conclusion almost entirely from a consideration of the different coinage ratios of Europe. Striking what he considered to be a fair average, he fixed upon the ratio of 15. Accordingly that ratio was adopted and coinage began, although upon a very small scale, for the country was a mere infant, and had been completely impoverished by the long struggle for independence.

From the opening of the mint in 1793 to the close of 1802, the total coinage had been $1,859,000 in gold, and $1,573,000 in silver, using round numbers. But in 1803 the French mint was thrown open freely to both metals at 15½ to 1. This made gold 3 per cent more valuable and silver 3 per cent less valuable at the French mint than at the American. The gold being more powerfully attracted by the coinage ratio of France, began to retire from circulation in this country and our currency consisted chiefly of silver.

In 1834 an attempt was made to apply a remedy, but instead of adopting the French ratio and putting ourselves in accord with the mint ratio of that country, we jumped over it to 16, or, more accurately, 15.988. By this ratio we gave gold a value of 3 per cent higher and silver a value of 3 per cent lower than they respectively had at the French mint. Accordingly the process was now reversed and the silver to a considerable extent retired from circulation. But in both cases it was the French mint, not "natural causes," that interfered with our circulation. The "market," that is, the demand for commodity use, had no more to do with it than the Gulf Stream had. First gold and then silver were drawn from America by the operation of the French law.

There is not a reputable economist in the world who does not recognize the fact that the French coinage law practically controlled what the gold people term the "market" both in Europe and America for a period of seventy years.

It is this precise circumstance that bimetallists rely upon in claiming that the United States can do the same thing now, this country being vastly greater in wealth, population, and power than France ever was.

But we are told that France has now closed her mints to silver. This is true, Mr. Speaker, but the reason she closed them was rather political than financial. Germany exacted a war indemnity of France amounting to a billion of dollars in gold. The acquisition of this extraordinary amount of gold enabled Germany to retire three hundred millions of her silver, and France closed her mints against that silver. Again, we are told there has been an overproduction of silver, so that it is impossible for us to do what France did for seventy years—maintain the parity. On this subject let me read an extract from a speech by a distinguished Senator of the United States, who is always careful and cautious in what he says. I refer to Senator COCKRELL, of Missouri.

If the total production of both gold and silver in the world during the four hundred years 1493 to 1893 were in existence to-day as a money, it would only be $14.47 per capita of the world, a wholly insufficient amount for the only money of final payment and redemption and the only measure of value. Search the world to-day and all the gold and silver money which can be found is only $6.34 per capita, a wholly inadequate amount for the transaction of the world's business. We have in the world to-day $2,570,900,000 of uncovered paper currency irredeemable for lack of gold and silver money. The nations having it are struggling to get gold and silver for its redemption, and will continue the struggle. In the five years 1889 to 1893 the world coined $165,976,893 of gold more than was produced, showing the fearful struggle for gold and its shifting from nation to nation and being recoined, and of the total silver product foreign nations alone coined over 66 per cent. They can not do without silver coins, can not part with what they have, and must continue to coin in the future as in the past, regardless of our action. Year by year the coined money disappears in numberless ways, known and unknown. The annual production does not keep pace with the increase of population, commerce, and industry, and the increasing demand for coined money.

Gold and silver are the most suitable metals for use as money and a measure of value, and have been used from time immemorial, and are more stable in their values than any other two metals. They have never been produced in unlimited quantities, like iron, lead, copper, zinc, and most other metals. Hence, no people have ever been flooded with gold and silver or either. Linked together as equals in money use for one hundred and eighty-five years prior to 1872, they maintained a most remarkably stable ratio during great changes in relative production, sometimes 75 per cent of silver to 25 per cent of gold, and then 75 per cent of gold to 25 per cent of silver.

There has been and is now no overproduction of silver. Mr. Speaker, after centuries of use of both metals the Secretary of the Treasury reports that in the world of metallic money there is to-day in round numbers $4,000,000,000 of gold and $4,000,000,000 of silver. Unfortunately this silver is not all standard money. There is no considerable quantity of silver bullion in the world outside our Treasury. India consumes as much as she ever did, and more is consumed in the arts.

As our distinguished friend from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] so well told us the other day, in his great speech made here, which in my judgment is unanswerable, the bulk ratio of gold and silver to-day, after centuries of effort to dig it from the earth, stands at just about the coinage ratio of 14 or 15 or 16 to 1.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sixteen and three-tenths, exactly.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Mississippi says 16$\frac{3}{10}$. It only remains, Mr. Speaker, to compare our resources with France and to say a word as to the greatness and power which we possess. With a population more than double and an area more than seventeen times as great as France, we have productive power more than Great Britain, France, and Germany all combined. Our country is new and comparatively undeveloped; our people are more industrious and productive than other people, and consume more. Mr. Mulhall, an English statistician, tells us that the merchandise transported on our railroads is double that carried on all the railways in all the countries in the world; we produce billions of dollars' worth of farm products, of manufactured goods, and of all the necessaries and luxuries of life. Our country is the richest in the world. It has been said:

It has in it every element of prosperity. * * * Nothing has ever been seen like the progress of this nation since the world began.

We need more money than any country under the sun. We are suffering now for want of it. With all these resources, who can doubt that the demand for money here and elsewhere will be and is so great that what our mint rate says is a dollar will be a dollar, with all the purchasing power of any other dollar at home and in all the markets of the world?

We ask that the law, that the law, shall look with favor upon silver coin, upon silver money. An act of Parliament confers upon the owner of a troy ounce of gold eleven-twelfths fine a title to £3 17s. 9d. in English money. The Government does not own the money. My friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] makes some point on that. He asks, "What good will it do to let bullion owners go to the mint and have their silver coined, when it does not belong to the Government?" What good, I ask the gentleman, does it do to permit owners of gold bullion to have it freely coined, when it does not belong to the Government? All free coinage is on private account.

In England the man who digs from the earth a troy ounce of gold, eleven-twelfths fine, is entitled by law—by act of Parliament—to receive in English money £3 17s. 9d. In the United States a man who digs from the earth 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, is entitled to receive a dollar of lawful money of the United States. What we propose is to put silver where it was before the act of 1873, so that the owner of 412½ grains of silver, nine-tenths fine, shall have a title at the mints of the United States to $1 in American money. When you give him a title to such a sum at the mints of the United States you will give him a title to a like sum in every country on earth, and, in my judgment, you will bring the bullion value of gold bullion and silver bullion together at your mint rate wherever commerce extends.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the contention on the silver side of this question. Feebly, I know, I have expressed it, and yet I have spoken with earnestness. I have said nothing I hope unkind; I have meant nothing unkind; I have dealt with frankness, appealing not to theory but to experience; not inviting you to enter any field which has not been explored, but inviting you to return to the ancient system under which this country grew and prospered as no other country of which we have account ever did grow or ever did prosper. If we will but emulate the example of the fathers, if we will but assert and maintain the political and the financial independence of our beloved country, we may confidently hope not only that prosperity will return, but that it will continue the perpetual heritage of the people of the United States. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman from Georgia occupied?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied an hour and a half, or very nearly that.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] proposes to occupy an hour of the equal time that will belong to the majority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] is recognized.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask for what time the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] is recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia rose.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, before my colleague begins, I ask unanimous consent that his time be so extended as to permit him to finish his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], that the time of his colleague [Mr. TURNER] be extended to enable him to conclude his remarks?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] wishes to occupy twenty-five minutes of the time belonging to the majority of the committee at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER]. With the understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to be allowed twenty-five minutes, there is no objection on our part.

There being no objection, the request of Mr. CRISP was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that I enter upon a great controversy. I must also confess the embarrassment which arises from the consideration that I have to follow in this debate my distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. Returning my thanks for the great courtesy which has just been shown me, I beg to say that I am actuated to-day by no aspiration to acquire credit for greater wisdom or courage than other men of my day and generation. [Applause.] I shall state opinions and conclusions which have been slowly, and I trust carefully, formed, but which I shall submit with the most respectful deference to the opinions of others. But, sir, I do not invoke any confidence merely by the expression of my opinions; on the contrary, I ask attention to the reasons which I give for the faith that I shall avow.

Let us look at the situation, and then see whether there are not some things about which we can agree and thus reduce the points of difference unfortunately existing on both sides of the House.

On the 27th of December last the House sent to the other branch of Congress a measure proposing to amend the law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds. That body has returned the bill with a complete displacement of the bond measure and a substitution for it of a free-coinage bill. So far as germaneness is concerned, they might just as well have put a protective tariff in place of the measure we sent them. They might just as well have put in place of our bill, and as a substitute for it, the abandoned subtreasury bill of the Populists. So far as germaneness is concerned, they might just as well have substituted a scheme for the annexation of Mexico, silver and all. [Laughter and applause.]

There are some things, Mr. Speaker, to which, as I intimated just now, all men may agree. In 1792 our predecessors in Congress inaugurated the coinage by the Government of gold and silver at the ratio of 15 to 1. Gold being worth in the market more than fifteen times as much as silver, it did not go to the mint. Being undervalued by the law, it went where it was more appreciated. Such gold pieces as we had were melted down or crossed the ocean for the better market value. Even our silver coinage was greatly reduced by the competition of the worn and abraded silver coins of Spain and Mexico, the dollar pieces of which countries the United States had made a legal tender. Both of these phenomena are due to that universal instinct or calculation of men and nations which discriminates between the good and bad in money and keeps the bad going. Every man who has good money and inferior or doubtful money will, in his business transactions, use first the doubtful; and what he reserves from use will be the good. What is true of the individual is also true of the aggregation of individuals called the people or the nation. This inevitable tendency is what is called "Gresham's law." By causing the sound money to be kept out of trade it works a contraction of the volume of currency and limits the circulation to the amount of the unsound with all its risks and uncertainty.

In 1837 Congress endeavored to correct the mistake of 1792 and made the ratio between gold and silver about 16 to 1 at the mints. Then it was soon found that by the new ratio silver was undervalued and that gold was not worth sixteen times as much as silver. The result again demonstrated that the mint ratio, prescribed by legal enactment, can not supersede market value. This time gold, being the inferior metal at the established ratio, came into circulation, and silver, because of its greater value in manufactures and in other countries, went out of circulation. Here is another great precedent which shows that an act of Congress can not in the matter of value supersede the common sense of mankind.

In 1853, in order to keep our change money or subsidiary coins, Congress reduced the quantity of silver in our halves, quarters, dimes, and half dimes so greatly that it would not pay to melt them for use in manufactures or to export them to other countries; but their legal-tender quality was limited to sums of $5, and our silver dollar, not having been included in this change of ratio, remained out of circulation.

In 1857 an act was passed absolutely demonetizing the foreign silver dollars we had—the only "dollars of our fathers." On the 21st of February of that year Congress enacted "that all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold or silver coins and declaring the same a legal tender in payment for debts are hereby repealed."

Thus was accomplished actually, and practically, and completely what has been since called the "crime of 1873." The act of 1873 was only an epitaph which marked an old grave. Who was it laid impious and sacrilegious hands on the "dollars of our fathers"? Our fathers themselves did the deed! Let justice be done though the heavens fall. And in 1853 and in 1857 there was no uprising of the poor, no flourishing of pitchforks, no threat of dynamite and anarchy. Even the exigencies of politics and of parties could make no occasion for a tear, or even for a protest. The farmer was never happier and the laborer never went to his work with a merrier heart.

From 1857 to 1861 gold was the only standard money we had, and yet for the rich and the poor, the creditor and the debtor, the farmer and the laborer, we had the happiest, the most prosperous, and the most magnificent era in the world's history. [Applause.] It was emphatically the golden age of the Republic!

What I have already said no man can dispute. I now approach the great question, which is: Can this country alone restore the parity between gold and silver by free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 under present conditions? We have just been told that this can be done; but my colleague did not support the assumption with any clear statement of his reasons for that opinion. This is the mighty issue we are to decide. I have already proven by evidence clear almost as holy writ that we were never heretofore able by free and unlimited coinage at either 15 or 16 to 1 to maintain the parity between the two metals. And yet the experiments we made in these previous efforts were made when the difference between the value of the two metals at the given ratio amounted to only 2 or 3 cents in the dollar. Now, that difference amounts to about 50 cents in the dollar. In the early experiments we had the cooperation of nearly all the commercial nations; now we have the cooperation of none. In the face of this simple recital it almost staggers credulity that able men should favor the proposed experiment.

But let us try the question as you would a case in court, by witnesses. The gentleman can cite Mexico as a friend and supporter of his view, but Mexico has utterly failed by free coinage at her ratio, which is more liberal to gold than ours, to even approximate parity between the two metals, and is now on a silver basis.

Certain countries of South America can be summoned as witnesses for free coinage of silver, but their experience has been like that of Mexico, and three of them (Chile, Brazil, and Venezuela) have adopted the gold standard. Shall we cite the Chinese, the followers of Confucius, whose great barbaric wall has yielded recently to the pounding of modern progress and civilization? [Applause.] Shall we call up the Japanese, that intelligent and progressive people who are in the act of abandoning the exploded theories about silver, and whose business men are to-day agitating the question of the reform of their financial difficulties which arise under the single silver standard. In what other quarter of the world can you find a people to testify for the free and unlimited coinage of silver?

Let us now hear the other side. In the first place, these are the greatest people in the world, whose boundless resources were accumulated under the gold standard; our own countrymen, whose sentiments on this question are shown in our statutes at all stages of our great progress, and will be shown again this afternoon on the pending motion. There is Great Britain, the land of our ancestors, whose flag floats on every sea and on every continent, whose wealth and power were acquired under the gold standard. These two constitute the English-speaking race, the race that has governed more of mankind and governed them longer and better than any other race known to history. There is Germany, that nation of philosophers and scholars; Russsia, the young giant of the Eastern Hemisphere; Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, France, and the British Government of India. In these countries are the sources of all our learning and civilization. Can there be any doubt how an impartial jury or court would decide this question, compassed about with such a cloud of witnesses? Let me here pause long enough to ask if the concurrent action of all these great nations depressed the value of silver, can we alone restore its value? It is a world-wide question, it would seem.

Let us now try this great question by the fireside, in the counting-house of the merchant, in the marts of trade, in the clubrooms, and in the labor organizations, by a mode of proof which ought to be satisfactory to all classes of men. Let us try it by our own experience. Under the act of 1878, known as the Bland-Allison Act, we entered on a scheme by which we were to coin not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver, nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month.

A MEMBER. Ounces.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. No; dollars. I am correct in my statement. It makes a considerable difference, because the bullion was purchased at its market value. Under the operation of this act, the very first year we coined over $20,000,000. After that it ran up from $24,000,000 to nearly $30,000,000 per annum, until we had got somewhere in the neighborhood of $400,000,000. Prior to 1878 we had not coined exceeding $8,000,000 of silver. Now, if one government alone can impart value, why did not this immense augmentation of the coinage of silver tend to raise or at least maintain the value of silver? To that question I have never obtained an answer. In fact, silver went down every year of the Bland-Allison Act at a fearful rate.

Then we tried another experiment. In 1890 we passed the Sherman Act, so framed as to provide for the purchase and the use, in some form, of more than the entire American product, or 54,000,000 ounces of silver per annum. How did that experiment operate? Instead of the law increasing or even sustaining the value of silver by a use of silver larger than the full capacity of our mints under free coinage—under that experiment silver went down until it reached figures appallingly low in the spring of 1893.

Under this decline we stood on the verge of a convulsion when the British Government in India, that great reservoir of silver, closed its mints to its free coinage. Its market value then fell to the lowest point it had ever reached, or about half. I now repeat, if the Government use of silver can impart to it value at the mint ratio, for which my colleague contends, why was it that silver, under these two very liberal measures, instead of going up, actually went down so fearfully?

Let us now enlarge our view of the situation. It is nearly always claimed on the other side of this question that half the money of the world has been stricken down. It is a false assumption. Except perhaps in Germany, no standard silver has been demonetized, and, in fact, all the countries of the world since 1873, according to the last report of the Director of the Mint, have actually coined $2,700,000,000 of silver. [Applause.] All the coined silver in the world at this time is estimated by the same authority to be somewhere in the neighborhood of $4,000,000,000. Of that immense sum, half, excluding recoinages, has been coined since 1873. Now, if this very liberal use of silver could not sustain its value, what becomes of the argument I am combating? As a matter of fact, more silver was coined during this period of limited coinage than during any like period of free and unlimited coinage. Why did silver go down instead of going up?

Mr. TERRY. Because they measure it in gold prices.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will endeavor, if my capacity is adequate to the occasion, to answer even that suggestion. [Laughter.] If it was fair to make the comparison between silver and gold at the beginning of the period, why is it not fair to make a comparison with gold now? Compared with gold at the beginning of this alleged outlawry of silver, silver was worth a premium of 2 to 3 cents on the dollar. Now, my friend ought not to insist on a change of standard when he comes to make a comparison in 1896. I ought to have the right to make the comparison according to the same standard in both cases. My friend ought to remember that we have now fifty times as much standard silver in this country as we had in 1873, and a great deal more gold; and it is therefore more liberal to silver to estimate its value now in gold than in 1873. We have an inflation now in standard money as compared with that year.

It may be assumed that the depression of silver is due rather to the fear that there would be too much of it than to any supposition that too little has been coined.

Finally, on this great issue, let me add that market value of an international commodity is at last the opinion of the business world. As that opinion is against the free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 or 15 to 1, this would seem to be the conclusion of the whole matter. You can not raise the value of any article by forcing it upon an unwilling market.

Much has been said about falling prices of other commodities, and it has been assumed that this decline is due to the alleged demonetization of silver, I have shown that there has been no demonetization of silver, and that, in fact, the coinage of silver has been greatly increased since this fall of prices began, or rather since 1878. But let us for the sake of the argument suppose that reductions in cost of production, increase in the number of producers, the multiplication of labor-saving devices, the lowering of freight rates, the development of other countries, and the improvement in modes of culture and manufacture have had nothing to do with the fall of the prices of our great staples, whatever we do in the premises, would not our great staples still be sold in gold-standard countries? Can we fix the price of cotton, or wheat, or provisions in Europe? It is well known that the prices of these staples are fixed on the other side of the ocean without regard to our currency, and our own markets simply follow those prices. However strong we may be, our arms are too short to reach across the sea.

What a great opportunity awaits the statesmen of England, Germany, and France if European treatment of silver is as baleful as represented. If statesmen are extinct, why does not some philanthropist like Coin arise in London, Paris, or Berlin, and denounce the oppressors of silver? The sturdy yeomen, the plain people of those countries, when they settle even in this free country, seem invariably to deprecate free and unlimited coinage of silver. If free silver could restore prosperity to the farmers of England, Germany, and France, why have they not gone to the palace gates with their demands? Are they all fools?

Mr. TERRY. I will say to the gentleman, as he asked me, that the popular branch of the German Assembly voted in favor of bimetallism, and the common people in England are the same way; but the Rothschilds hold a mortgage on every throne in Europe, just like they held a receivership of the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. And you would put the Treasury of the United States into bankruptcy in an hour. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. It has already been there under your system. It was put there by your system.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, my friend is content with mere assertion. I will endeavor as I go along, if my strength does not fail me, respectfully to demonstrate the peril to which I think he invites the country. I do not question his capacity, nor his greater learning, nor wisdom. I simply crave the right to offer my own reflections in the matter.

Mr. TERRY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Some reference has been made here to Mr. Balfour's opinion, and my friend from Arkansas has just referred to something that has transpired in the popular branch of the German Reichstag. He has not been fair in that citation. Mr. Balfour, in answer to a delegation which called upon him last year and urged a larger use of silver, distinctly said that the Government of England could not undertake it alone and unaided. When the gentleman referred to the action of the German Parliament, he ought to have been candid enough to say that the proposition there was to inaugurate the larger use of silver by the common consent of the commercial nations as ascertained in an international conference. [Applause.]

I am sure that there are many men who have been earnest and consistent friends of silver for years, who would feel the keenest anxiety if its unlimited coinage should be attempted under present conditions. They feel now that the great problem before us is how to preserve the parity of the great stock of silver dollars we already have. But there are others who manifest no such concern. What care they about convulsions? Have we not a right to pay our obligations in silver? Mr. Gladstone is represented as saying that England can not consent to free coinage of silver because England is a creditor nation, and it is contended that we should have free coinage because we are a debtor nation.

Mr. Speaker, I repudiate that doctrine. It is to the interest of a creditor nation to maintain a sound standard of money, but it is still more to the interest of a debtor nation to maintain its credit at the highest point. [Applause.] Would a bank bidding for the confidence of the community dare to force on its depositors or other creditors cheaper money than it demands?

Mr. LINNEY. If it will not disturb the gentleman, as I understand he is a North Carolinian by birth, I wish he would allow me to ask him a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad indeed to yield to my friend, but I am in the midst of an argument in which I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. LINNEY. My question is a very short one.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman may ask his question at a later stage.

Mr. Speaker, I admit that according to the letter of the law we can pay our debts in silver. But should we do so against the consent of the holders of our bonds? In 1878 was passed the concurrent resolution to which my colleague [Mr. CRISP] alluded in December, and to which he has again alluded on this occasion, which, reciting the acts authorizing the bond issues, declared that it was competent and within the power of this Government to discharge its obligations in silver dollars of standard weight and fineness. But let us see the circumstances under which those bonds were issued, down through the series including those which were sold the other day.

In 1870 and 1875, when the large bond acts were passed, we had no silver dollars, and down to 1878 we had none. Our standard coin was gold, and gold only. Some correspondence took place between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General, as stated by my colleague, and an opinion was given as to the kind of coin that would discharge these obligations. All that I concede, for I do not deny the narrow, technical, legal right. Neither do I deny that the Congress can lawfully change the ratio now so that we shall have only one-half as many grains of gold in our gold dollar as we have now, or that the Congress can change the silver dollar so that it shall contain only one-half the number of grains of silver of which it is now composed. We have that power. It was competent for us to do that then; it is competent for us to do it now. It is in our power to repudiate all our debts and to maintain the repudiation at the mouths of our cannon.

In the first place, the Stanley Matthews resolution of 1878 is not law. It never became a law under the Constitution of the United States. It undertook to prescribe a rule of action for the executive department, and yet it was never submitted to the executive department for approval, as required by the Constitution. That Constitution requires that every order or resolution which is intended to have the effect of law shall either be approved by the President or, being disapproved by him, shall be passed by a two-thirds vote over his veto. There was probably a reason, Mr. Speaker, why the Stanley Matthews resolution was never submitted to the Executive. Mr. Hayes, then President of the United States, had vetoed the Bland-Allison Act that session and might have disapproved the resolution. It was therefore simply a declaration of opinion on the part of certain gentlemen who had seats in the Senate or in the House of Representatives. Let us hear no more, then, of the Stanley Matthews resolution as law.

Now, let us look still further. By the resumption act of 1875 it was provided that the Treasury, from surplus revenues and from the sale of bonds, should accumulate coin for the redemption of the Treasury demand notes and obligations. That act did not, in fact, contemplate silver, because we had no silver dollars in the country. And it is well known that the Secretary of the Treasury actually accumulated $100,000,000 in gold only as the redemption fund, since well known as "the gold reserve." And since my colleague has been a member of the House an act was passed distinctly recognizing that reserve of $100,000,000 of gold for the purpose indicated; and whenever we have sold bonds since the resumption act, at home or abroad, we have required that they should be paid for in gold. Let it also be remembered that as a debtor nation, on the faith of this history, we invited the people at home and abroad to take our bonds—bonds of our municipalities, bonds of our States, bonds of our business enterprises of every kind—with the implied pledge that the Treasury would maintain the equality of our greenback circulation with gold. Since that time silver has gone down until the value of our silver dollars to our foreign creditors has gone down to half, or to 50 cents on the dollar. I ask is it consistent with national honor and integrity in the face of this recital to say that it is morally right for us to pay our debts in silver on this depreciated basis? But, sir, something has been said here about the interest of the debtors in this question.

I believe that there is hardly a debtor in this country who would be benefited by the election of a free-silver Congress and a free-silver President. If such event should ever happen, before the necessary act could be passed and put into effective operation what would happen? Every man in the world that holds a bond against the people or Government of the United States or a State or corporation of this country would, in order to anticipate silver payments, rush to his broker and order the sale of the obligation. Every holder of every sort of marketable security payable in the United States, whether he resides in London, in Berlin, in Paris, in New York, in Boston, or anywhere else, would rush to sell. They would no longer be buyers of our bonds, but raging madmen seeking to sell them. In such a panic, what would become of cotton, wheat, and prices of all property, and what would become of the debtor? If there is a man on this floor owning any sort of bonds who would not sell them under such conditions, let him stand up. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Perhaps they have not any. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, sir, what I have indicated as the necessary effect of a change of our fiscal policy, or, I may add, from a strong prospect of such a change, upon our marketable securities is equally true as to private obligations. Suppose my friend from Arkansas owed me a debt of $1,000 payable in the current money, now equal to gold, and that I should discover that it may be brought about that I might have to take depreciated silver, what would I do? I might sue, as I am human.

Mr. TERRY. You ought to receive the money of the contract.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Ah, the gentleman from Arkansas has not answered my suggestion.

Mr. TERRY. And you have not answered mine.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman from Arkansas forgets that I supposed that he owed me $1,000 in gold, or its equivalent, and that I should apprehend that silver might be forced on me when depreciated. My question was as to what I would be likely to do in advance of the depreciation.

Mr. TERRY. But suppose my contract provided for the payment of $1,000 to you in coin when silver was a part of the coin money of this country? Would you consider it honest afterwards to go to work and influence legislation so as to get two dollars for every one that I owed you? [Applause.] That is what you are doing, and the people understand it, and don't you forget it.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend's suggestion does not comport with the character of the occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. TERRY. It does not fit what you are proposing to say.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will put it again. My supposition was that the gentleman had made the debt in gold or its equivalent when silver was at a premium, or at par, and efforts likely to succeed pending which might degrade silver to 50 cents on the dollar; does he think that I would wait to be paid in that sort of depreciated money? [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. I would stand within my right if I paid you according to contract. I have before me the act in regard to the bonds, to which he has been referring. They are payable in coin.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Oh, yes.

Mr. TERRY. They were originally payable in lawful money. They went to work under an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit" and made them payable in coin, and they were so sold.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend has made that very clear. [Laughter.]

Mr. TERRY. And it is a full answer to your statement.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, Mr. Speaker, what I insist upon in my supposition just now is not what is the narrow technical right of the debtor, but what would a creditor do who feared that if he waited on his debtor he might have to take bad money for good, or 50 cents on the dollar. He would probably not wait.

As to the public debt, I may say that I was endeavoring to show that any holder of our securities anticipating from political tendencies or the result of elections that he might be paid in money inferior to the standard prevailing at the time of his contract would at once unload his securities. We might with profit remember the lessons of experience. Why, sir, instead of paying the public creditor one dollar for two, I would rather pay two for one. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. That is what you are asking us to do.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But I insist that there is no such alternative here. But we ought to pay our debts like honest people, dollar for dollar. We ought not, like a tricky insolvent, to pay our debts at 50 cents in the dollar.

Now, prior to these interruptions I was endeavoring to show, Mr. Speaker, what would be the effect of our return to silver payments in the face of the apprehensions which are entertained by all mankind. I have shown how it would endanger the character of our great people, the greatest in the world, as my colleague said. And if we are the greatest in the world, I utterly scorn and repudiate the idea that we will pay inferior nations in money inferior to that with which they pay their obligations to us. [Applause.]

I have endeavored also to show that this descent to silver payment would involve a merciless sacrifice of all the debtors in this country. No bank would grant renewals of debts except upon the gold basis. No private individual would extend a debt due to him in gold or its equivalent, by taking anything but a gold debt in renewal, and before the event which my friend from Arkansas desires could occur every poor delinquent debtor in the United States would either be in the poorhouse or his property would have been sold in a time of panic to pay his debts.

Now, I want to show, Mr. Speaker, that those who framed this bill in the Senate and those who defend it in the House are not fair and frank. They have not the courage of their convictions. They denounce the Secretary for redeeming our demand notes in gold, and insist that he shall redeem them in silver when more convenient. Now, why did not the friends of this measure take away from the Secretary any option in the matter? He found that his predecessors had all, under the laws, paid out gold, when demanded, in redemptions, and he declines to change this policy under the circumstances existing. If he is wrong, why do you not take the responsibility of the change? Why do you not provide expressly that he shall redeem our demand notes in silver or in gold and silver half and half or in other proportions? You make him still responsible for the credit of the Government and of our money and arraign him for doing what you not only permit but refuse to forbid. He has during his entire term been struggling with a most dangerous situation and with scant resources in the laws, with no cooperation on the part of Congress and maligned by members of his own party. He has on him all our burdens. The business interests of the whole country depend on the correctness of his judgment. An error in his exalted station on the fatal side would bring unspeakable calamities. If the friends of this measure know better than he does, why, I repeat, do they not take away his discretion and substitute explicit and mandatory directions? It is unfair. It is not magnanimous. It violates even the morals of politics, if there are any morals in politics.

In order to show that some effort has been made to degrade silver, we have been told to-day that the Secretary of the Treasury has refused to exchange silver for gold. I do not know where the authority for that statement comes from.

Mr. CRISP. I will show it to you. I will have the document here in a moment.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My colleague can tell me what it is.

Mr. CRISP. It is the testimony of Mr. Carlisle before the Committee on Appropriations. It was first, I think, in the shape of a communication in response to some Senate resolution. I will show the gentleman what the Secretary says in regard to it.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I shall be glad to have the whole communication.

Mr. CRISP. I will give the gentleman what I have. I can not furnish him what I have not. I will show him the Secretary's statement in a moment.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will not impeach the fairness of my colleague. Nevertheless, I do not believe the statement as it has been presented here, and I believe that a mistake is made about it. I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. Any excess over and above the amount of silver necessary to represent the silver certificates outstanding, and to meet the requirements of the Sherman Act, which requires that the Secretary should coin as much of the silver purchased as was necessary to redeem notes issued under the act when presented for redemption—and keeping in view the limitations of that act—I say, any excess of silver over and above those requirements Mr. Carlisle would have given out eagerly for greenbacks or gold at any time that the application was made to him, and would have paid the freight on it to California or Alaska. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. Here is the statement. I hold in my hand a statement of Mr. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, before the House Committee on Appropriations, in charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill for 1896. The testimony was given on the 21st day of January, 1895. I have read a part of it, about the exercise of the option. I will now read further:

Mr. SIBLEY. I understand you to say you have now $3,000,000 of free silver in the Treasury?

Secretary CARLISLE. Yes, sir; about that amount.

Mr. SIBLEY. In your reply to the Senate resolution asking why the Treasury had refused to give silver in exchange for gold, I think you replied to the Senate to the effect you had no free silver. Has this silver accumulated since that time?

Secretary CARLISLE. I do not remember the date of that reply.

Mr. SIBLEY. That was August 17, 1893.

Secretary CARLISLE. In the summer of 1893, by an oversight of the assistant treasurers throughout the United States, silver dollars were paid out to meet the extraordinary demand which then existed for small currency to such an extent that we had, in fact, more silver certificates outstanding than we had silver dollars in the Treasury. When I discovered the fact it was stopped, of course, at once. The ten subtreasuries are scattered throughout the country, and, not being in communication with each other, when the people demanded silver dollars on account of the great necessity for small currency, they paid them out freely, and it was discovered that they had done so to such an extent that outstanding silver certificates to the amount of between $600,000 and $700,000 had no silver left behind them.

That was when he stopped it, and so stated.

A MEMBER. Very properly.

Mr. CRISP. It was not a question of propriety, but as to whether the Secretary refused to pay silver.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. For gold.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. On uncovered silver.

Mr. CRISP. Silver for gold was my statement. The gentleman from Tennessee questions that, and the gentleman was present and asked a question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia will allow me——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. This is a controversy between me and my colleague.

Mr. WASHINGTON. But your colleague has brought me into it also.

Mr. CRISP. You brought yourself in by your remark.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I was present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I do.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And I was one of those who asked a question of the Secretary of the Treasury to establish the fact as to whether silver ever was redeemed in gold—that was an assertion that had been made by our free-silver friends—and the Secretary said silver was a money of ultimate redemption and was not redeemed in gold; that he did not refuse to exchange gold for silver and that its payment was not refused except when he found there was less silver in the Treasury than there were outstanding silver certificates.

Mr. CRISP. That is precisely what I said.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I never impeached the gentleman's statement except that while I was willing to admit that he believed his statement, I still believed that there was a mistake made somewhere; and my statement was, that in my opinion at no time when the Secretary had silver over and above the silver certificates, and above the requirements of the Sherman Act, has he failed to exchange it when asked for greenbacks or gold.

Mr. CRISP. Will my colleague allow me just here? Of course I know he does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. My statement was distinctly that when gold was taken to the Treasury for silver the answer was, "I can not give you silver, because I have got no more silver than I have got outstanding certificates;" and when certificates were brought there under the Sherman Act they said, "We will not require you to take silver, but we will give you gold." That is the very point of the case. [Applause.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I put it to the fairness of the House and my colleague, was not he endeavoring to demonstrate that there was a settled, a fixed, a determined purpose to discredit silver, and did not he cite this instance as a demonstration of it? [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. He did, and does; does now.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. And when my colleague drew that conclusion the friends who agree with him on this side clapped louder than I have heard them during the entire delivery of his eloquent speech. And when it comes to be examined, so far from there having been any base, wicked effort in these transactions to discredit silver, the effort of the Secretary of the Treasury in the case cited was to maintain silver [applause], and to maintain the credit and honor of the Government in the same transaction. [Renewed applause.]

The Secretary could not give the silver for gold on the occasion mentioned because he had no silver that he could use for that purpose, and when he gave gold for Sherman notes it was to protect the Sherman notes under the established policy of the Treasury. Such is the whole matter.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. No, sir; I have had enough of my friend. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend a question in further elucidation of this point.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I have just declined to yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think my friend will consent to yield to me.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If my friend from Arkansas will consent, I will yield.

Mr. TERRY. I do not see why the gentleman should ask me to consent when he refused me his consent.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I had yielded to the gentleman many times.

Mr. TERRY. You only yielded to me when you turned around in your place and asked a question of me.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I see that my friend from Arkansas believes that I have been guilty of some discourtesy to him.

Mr. TERRY. I do not, sir. But you would create the impression that I had not been called upon to answer any question by you.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I did not, and the gentleman knows——

Mr. TERRY. The RECORD will show.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I was about to decline to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi because I had declined to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I will give my consent to let him ask all the questions he desires. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, if my friend has got a really hard question [laughter], if he has got something better than all the forty-eight reasons he gave the other night, or anything else that will knock out my argument, I will yield to him.

Mr. TERRY. I do not propose, sir, to knock out the argument of so able a man as the gentleman from Georgia, but the question I proposed to ask him was this——

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I merely want to ask the gentleman this question, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will hear my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I understand my friend to say that when gold was presented at the Treasury and silver was asked for——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Stop! I did not mean to testify myself that any such affair as that ever occurred. [Laughter.] What I said was that if it did occur——

Mr. TERRY. Well, it certainly did occur according to the testimony of Mr. Carlisle. Now, when that gold was presented, the reply of the Secretary, as I understand the gentleman to state it, was this: "I can not pay out these silver dollars in exchange for gold because by the law I am required to keep them here for the redemption of the Sherman notes."

Several MEMBERS. No, no!

Mr. TERRY (continuing). And yet, when the Sherman notes were presented, the silver that had been kept there for their redemption was not used for that purpose but gold was paid instead. That is the point.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can not think that it is necessary, after what has transpired to-day, for me to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Arkansas. He did not catch the point. It appears in the report made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury that by voluntary exchanges with bankers and patriotic Americans he raised in 1893, on United States notes, $110,000,000 in gold to replenish the stock of gold in the Treasury. I therefore assumed that the Treasury, when occupied with that operation, would not have refused to give any spare silver for gold, and that proposition has also been sustained by the documents just cited. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for his question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Never mind. Go on.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I did not mean to cut off my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I understand that, but I will not interrupt the gentleman now.

Mr. LINNEY. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask that question which I desired to ask?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. On what branch of the subject is it?

Mr. LINNEY. Right on the line you are dealing with now.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is a "Tarheel," and I can not refuse to hear his question [laughter], but I will ask him to make it brief, because I am very weary.

Mr. LINNEY. I see that you do not approve—at any rate I think I see that you do not approve—of any further issue and sale of bonds. Now, if that be so, please tell us how you are going to stop the further issue and sale of bonds unless you either raise more revenue by the tariff or coin more silver to redeem our obligations as they mature?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend has got his argument into his question, but he attributes to me an opinion which he has no right to assume that I hold.

Mr. LINNEY. Is it not true that you do not favor any further issue and sale of bonds?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I am about to answer him as such an inquiry ought to be answered, with all due respect to my friend from North Carolina. I assume that the gentleman himself is opposed to the further issuing of bonds.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I assume that the gentleman is also in favor of this bill for such use of silver as the bill contemplates.

Mr. LINNEY. Yes, sir; although I should prefer to limit the coinage to the American product.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Well, that does not make any difference as to the point at issue between me and my friend from Tar River. [Laughter.]

Now, let us see how that will work. Suppose you pass this bill for the free coinage of silver and then take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to sell bonds for gold, what then will the word "coin" mean in our laws?

I have before me here a statement from the Treasurer of the United States which shows that during the last two months the Treasury Department has not, at the custom-houses, received one dollar of gold or gold certificates. Now, take from the Treasury the power to sell bonds for gold and what will the Secretary do? By that simple device we will be on the silver basis in very short order. I infer that my friend from North Carolina is ready to take that fatal step.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me for a brief question?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I can not refuse my friend from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman said the Secretary, in 1893, by the exchange of currency obtained $110,000,000 in gold. Why, then, did it become necessary since that time, or why is it necessary now, to sell bonds to procure gold if that could be done in that dark and trying year?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I will endeavor to answer my friend from Missouri, who is always a considerate man when he discards his prejudices and commitments. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Department exhausted its power to obtain gold in that way. That is the answer I make to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, if the gentleman will pemit another question: How do we know, and how does the gentleman know, that he has exhausted the power to obtain gold? Has he tried it since then, and before resorting to the issuance of bonds?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. He continued to invite these exchanges by circulars, as I understand, and failed to obtain any material amount in addition.

Mr. Speaker, we are too near the silver basis now to take away from the Secretary the power to get gold in any way the law allows. Gresham's law is already operating. We can not repeal that great ordinance of commerce. Let gentlemen examine the cash which passes through their hands from day to day. They will find that they are receiving and paying out nothing but silver certificates. And silver certificates have superseded other money because the belief prevails that other money is better. We are dangerously near to actual disparity between our several kinds of money——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which shows that the gentleman from Georgia practically agrees with me that gold has gone out of circulation.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. This is a state of things which shows that the people and the banks are deaf now to patriotic considerations, out of fear, and are following the statute of Gresham or the law of self-preservation, so that if collapse comes they may fence against calamity. The great banks are sending out only silver currency, and it is the only money occupying the channels of trade. If a panic befalls, and this currency is depreciated one-half, on whom will the loss fall most heavily?

Will it be on the great banks? No; because they have gold in their vaults. Will it be the great capitalists, societies, and corporations—"Wall street," "the money power," so called? No; because they have gold, or gold obligations. But it will fall on those who handle a dollar or two, or $10, from day to day, and who will have to take it in their daily wages, and upon these farmers who will have to take it for what they are compelled to sell, and thus all this value made by law will evaporate and disappear from the scant hoards of the poor, whom it is our special duty to guard and protect. [Applause.]

It is very easy to put us down on a silver basis. It is very easy to talk about the debtor. It is very easy to talk about the poor man and the money of the poor. But I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that according to all experience and according to the judgment of those who have devoted their lives to this great inquiry in the interest of humanity—I affirm that there is no class of people in this country so deeply concerned in the maintenance of a sound and stable standard of value as the wage earner, the farmer, and the poor man, from one end of this country to the other. [Applause.] The others, these capitalists, these bankers, can take care of themselves and adjust themselves to the shifting, changing conditions of affairs. But the poor fellow who follows the furrow, or works at his bench, or carries his bucket to the shop in the morning—these men have no opportunity or means to prepare for a panic, no resources on which to bank, and no means with which to hedge or speculate; these men, who have been appealed to for their own ruin and degradation in this business, are those who are most concerned in maintaining a safe and stable currency. [Applause.]

Suppose that a man is receiving now $1 for his daily wage. How long after the collapse comes will he have to work and wait before he can raise his wages from $1 of nominal value to $2? How long will it take the farmer to catch up with the procession and double the nominal price of his products? How long will it take laborers by strikes and combinations and wars of every kind—how long will it take them to compel their employers to double their nominal pay under these conditions? But what they have to buy will go up at a bound.

Mr. Speaker, triumphant reference has been made here to the case of France. That has been thrown in our faces from every quarter. It comes to us from the Senate. It comes to us here to-day. It comes to us, I say, from every source.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who sits on my left, is quite familiar with French finances. I have had the pleasure of conferring with him on this subject, and have had the benefit of his valuable suggestions. I myself pursued the subject with some care. I have endeavored to seek information from the highest sources. France tried free coinage and abandoned it. It was a country friendly to silver, because silver is indispensable to the business of that country. A very large business there is done in silver coins of every denomination, and even in centimes. Transactions there are small and infinite. At the same time, the small dealers and farmers of France have no accounts with banks. They keep their own money. Under such a system a large volume of silver is indispensable. It is a country which could not have been induced to suspend free coinage except for the gravest reasons.

France tried the experiment of an international agreement and joined in what was called the Latin Union, a union with Italy, Switzerland, Greece, and Belgium, by which they fixed a ratio between the two metals and international coins of the same weight and fineness circulated freely in all the countries named. That union has been dissolved; and since France has refused the free coinage of silver the coins of like value in these other parts of the Latin Union that happened to be in France have been rejected by the shopmen everywhere, and in addition to that, the Bank of France has recently returned to Italy, under a sort of Government auspices, two or three millions of dollars in Italian silver coin, because the French people would no longer take them, although they were a party to their coinage.

In France the Government has no demand notes outstanding, while we have $500,000,000. France has no such thing as agitation for free coinage at 15 to 1 by France alone, as a menace to its system of finance. In this country our stock of gold, with a population of over 70,000,000 of people, is $618,000,000. In France the stock of gold, in a country of about 35,000,000 inhabitants, is $850,000,000.

The per capita allowance of gold would be in this country $8.78. In France it would be $22.10.

How is it with silver? In the United States we have a total, including the coinage of limited tender, of $625,000,000 of silver—more of it than gold. In France the silver is $487,000,000. With uncovered paper estimated—for all this enters into the calculation—we have, on the basis assumed in the Treasury, which excludes the paper in the Treasury and the Sherman notes, but taking the basis of uncovered paper there after the gold reserve is deducted, we have a per capita of uncovered paper amounting to $5.92, while in France it is only 84 cents.

Now let us run that out. I here use the figures of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. France holds $231,000,000 more gold than we do, and she has only about one-half of the population. France holds $384,000,000 less of uncovered paper than we do. If we had the same per capita of gold as France we would have $1,567,279,700 of gold. Taking the per capita of silver in France, we would have of that metal $913,952,200. Our excess of gold over silver would at that per capita be $653,227,500. Now, we have more silver than gold. If we had only the same per capita of uncovered paper as France we would have $59,329,200 instead of $416,700,000. With such resources at his command, our Secretary of the Treasury, with such a limited strain for redemptions, would be happier than he has been for many a day.

The Bank of France has a monopoly of note issues, and keeps its paper almost entirely covered with gold and silver. It largely conducts the fiscal operations of the Government, which appoints its president and two of its vice-presidents. But the bank's assets are not those of France. It does not pay out as much silver as does our Treasury Department. All our collections from all sources of taxation are now in silver and uncovered paper; we get no gold, so that we do a great deal more with silver than the French Government and the Bank of France combined. We pay out many hundred millions of silver over the counter at the Treasury, and we receive nearly all our revenues in that currency. We honor silver a great deal more than France. As I have said, France has no demand notes to redeem. If we had none and had her resources in money, there would be no fear of silver such as is now apparent in this country.

It is sometimes said that the Government of France exercises the option to pay in silver or gold as it pleases. It has no demand obligations to meet, and as to Government disbursement we use daily a great deal more silver currency. The Bank of France will frequently pay silver to those who present bills at its counter; but whenever the person who presents the paper will state that he needs the gold for export or for any purpose for which silver is not as good as gold, they will give him the gold; and, as my friend indicates, that is largely a matter of accommodation.

My friend from Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAMS, has just asked me what I would do. If I could have my way, Mr. Speaker, I would stop all this agitation for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. [Applause.] I would allay all this menace offered the world against the credit and character of our obligations. I would make it as peaceable and quiet on this dangerous and perilous line as it is in France, in England, or in any other country where they have a stable currency and commercial repose and quiet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my friend allow me just one interruption? Does my friend know of any practical way of preventing public agitation in a free country that is carried on by popular vote? I want to get the gentleman's idea as to a practical method.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I know of no way to bring that about but to appeal to the good sense and conscience of intelligent gentlemen like my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. Speaker, my friend and I have made it so clear, together with others, since the foundation of this Government, that a protective tariff, for example, was perfectly absurd, that it can not be made any clearer; but the agitation continues, and I have asked the gentleman with reference to this silver question privately to give to the House some idea of how he proposes to continue to maintain a parity under the present system. Now, I admit that if there was no agitation there might be a great deal less trouble about a parity, but I have asked him for some practical method of doing the thing.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the correct thing, the ideal thing, the best thing, is very seldom practical in politics. People learn some things by experience, and I have been endeavoring to teach the lessons of experience. We may have to learn in the bitter school of adversity. We ought to avert calamity by the retirement of our demand obligations and the substitution of good bank issues, thereby releasing the Treasury from the entire system of redemption and furnishing gold for all the world.

If we could allay the fear of silver and paper money now pervading the land and restore confidence in our future, capital now hidden would seek active investment and our wonderful resources would again multiply as they have never done before. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have pursued this argument much longer than I had intended. I am greatly indebted to the House for its great forbearance. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this debate has been protracted to such a length and the questions involved, some of them at least, have been so exhaustively discussed that I feel a decided disinclination to trespass for any length of time upon the attention of the House. I shall not attempt to cover in detail ground already covered by the gentleman who has preceded me [Mr. TURNER of Georgia], nor shall I waste time by stopping to indulge in words of preface or introduction.

The main proposition before this House has received almost no discussion. That proposition involves the question whether this House is willing to abandon its own legislation already adopted and accept legislation suggested by the Senate under the guise of an amendment, which differs wholly from the legislation of the House and is in no respect germane thereto. The House sent to the Senate a bill for the protection of our coin redemption fund and authorizing the issue of certificates of indebtedness and of bonds for the purposes of securing a national loan. That legislation was enacted to meet a supposed national exigency. The Senate has returned that bill with all after the enacting clause stricken out, and has substituted for the House legislation, among other things, a provision for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Even if this House should be in favor of such legislation as independent legislation, it is not consistent with its dignity that it should indorse the revolutionary methods of the Senate and abrogate its own constitutional function with respect to the raising of revenue; and I take the liberty of saying to the friends of free silver in this House, and especially to the friends of free silver on this side of the Chamber, that the cause they advocate will not gain a single friend nor will it make a single step toward success by any attempted humiliation of this House or subjection of it to the demands of the Senate. [Applause.]

The question as to the free and unlimited coinage of silver when presented to this House in a frank, open, manly way, in accordance with the rules of the House, is one thing; when that question is sought to be presented in the revolutionary way in which it is now sought to be presented by the Senate it is an entirely different thing. And, Mr. Speaker, I trust that gentlemen, when they come to vote to-day, will remember that the question upon which they vote is the simple question: Shall we abandon our own legislation, or shall we maintain the honor and the dignity of the House of Representatives of the American people? So much for that.

Now, I want to say a word or two with respect to that portion of the Senate substitute which relates to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. But before I say anything on that subject directly, let me say that there is no question of bimetallism here presented at this time. All the declamation that we have heard upon that subject is simply declamation, so much "thundering in the index," without any reference at all to the practical question that is presented for settlement.

What is the proposition that is presented? One ounce of gold will buy in the open market to-day 32 ounces of silver. The bald proposition presented by this substitute is, that the United States Government shall certify, contrary to the fact, that 16 ounces of silver are the equivalent of 1 ounce of gold, and shall, by legislation, decree that the Government itself will accept them as such and will compel each and every of its citizens to do the same. That is the proposition stated in plain and simple English. It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that the bare statement of the proposition in an assembly of honest men should carry with it its own refutation.

The advocates of silver, however, rest their case upon certain propositions which, if they can be sustained, appeal to our consideration. What are those propositions?

They are, first, that silver was demonetized by an act of Congress passed in 1873, in secret, pursuant to a conspiracy. Upon the faith of this proposition free-silver advocates grow eloquent over "the greatest legislative crime of all history." Then they say, in the second place, that after 1873, consequent upon the demonetization of silver, there was a fatal fall in prices, to the restraint of enterprise, to the destruction of trade, of the interests of agriculture, of business prosperity, and that that fall in prices and the demonetization of silver bore to each other the relation of cause and effect. They say, in the third place, that the remedy for this existing evil is in the remonetization of silver, and that for the remonetization of silver all that is necessary is that the United States, single handed and alone, shall open its mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Now, how much is there of truth in these several propositions? In the first place, Mr. Speaker, silver was not demonetized by the act passed in 1873. It was not demonetized secretly. It was not demonetized in pursuance of a conspiracy, and no legislative crime, in my judgment, was committed. The history of the demonetization of silver has to do with natural causes, with the law of supply and demand, and with the history of Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and the Latin Union. With respect to that history I do not undertake to make any argument. I undertake to make no argument, why? Because it is not of the slightest practical consequence whether silver was demonetized by the act of 1873 or not, nor is it now of any practical consequence, even the slightest, how it was demonetized or for what reason.

Suppose it was demonetized by that act; suppose it was demonetized when it should not have been demonetized. I ask you as plain, practical business men, charged with the interests of the people of this country, what bearing has that on the question as to the expediency or the justice of the United States now, in the year 1896, declaring by legislation that 50 cents shall be equal to 129 cents?

That question, Mr. Speaker, is a vital, fundamental question of business methods. It is not a question of morals or of history; it is not a question of what was right or what was wrong in the year 1873; it is a plain, practical, common-sense, business question as to what is right in this year of our Lord 1896. We are not legislating upon the conditions that prevailed in 1873, but we are called upon to legislate upon conditions that prevail now.

Now, just at this point let me emphasize the fact that there is no controversy between the advocates of the respective sides of this subject as to the present commercial value of silver. It is agreed that the relation of silver to gold is that of 32 to 1; and just here we encounter two different kinds of silver advocates; one will say, Restore silver to the mint and the legal and commercial value of silver and gold will at once approximate each other. The other will make no such claim, but will freely confess that to open our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver will put us upon a silver basis at once. These latter justify themselves by saying that silver has not gone down, but that gold has gone up.

Now, the first of these classes, whether honestly or not, claim to be bimetallists; the second class are, whatsoever they may say to the contrary, silver monometallists. Unless the commercial price of silver can be advanced to its gold price by free coinage I assume that every honest free-silver advocate will admit that he has no case.

The success of his case rests upon the assumption that free and unlimited coinage by the United States will advance the commercial value of silver to the ancient ratio in its relation to gold of 16 to 1.

It will be admitted, I think, that the burden of proof is on the party making such assertion. How shall that proof be made? Not by mere assertion. Dogmatism is not proof. That gentlemen arise here and with feeling and eloquence, and I have no doubt honesty, declare that they believe that the opening of our mints to free coinage will advance the price of silver amounts to absolutely nothing. As many gentlemen and more gentlemen will arise on this floor and declare that in their belief it will not. So, Mr. Speaker, we must set off belief against belief. We are still lacking in proof. How, then, shall we find out whether or not the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver will appreciate the price of silver? There is, as it seems to me, evidence to be had upon the subject that is cogent and convincing as proof, and that evidence is against the sanguine belief of the friends of free silver.

The history of silver as money divides itself into two periods, one prior to 1873 and the other subsequent to that date. The conditions that existed prior to 1873 and the conditions that exist to-day differ widely from each other. Prior to 1873 gold and silver circulated concurrently as money at the ratio of about 16 to 1. Prior to 1873 every commercial nation in Europe (with the single exception of England) and the United States held their mints open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Prior to 1873, for almost a century, the annual production of silver was a substantially uniform, unvarying quantity. When its annual production largely increased and the commercial nations of Europe, the Latin Union included, closed their mints against free coinage, the price of silver at once declined and gold and silver ceased to be on a parity at the old ratio. Since that time the production of silver has increased 150 per cent and the cost of its production has decreased 50 per cent.

It is a fair inference, I submit, that the elements of production and those of international agreement and particular legislation were the causes that kept gold and silver on a parity, and that when international agreement ceased to exist the tie that bound gold and silver together was broken, and the latter became subject to the same laws as to value that relate to any other commodity.

Now, then, if you propose to restore the conditions of the period to which I refer, if you propose to reopen these closed mints, to reenter into these rescinded agreements, to reestablish the relative productions of gold and silver, then I will grant you that you may again have gold and silver as money upon a parity and upon the ancient terms.

But the annual production of silver being as it is, and the cost of its production being as it is, and both differing from what they were in the period under discussion, and no European nation coining silver, when you assert that the United States alone can restore the old conditions there is a fatal halt in your logic; you are asserting a non sequitur, and the facts of history, so far as this period goes, are against you. That all Europe and the United States, aided by the laws of supply and demand, accomplished a certain result is no proof that the United States alone, even aided by the same laws, could accomplish the result, much less is it proof that it could do so when the laws have been changed to the cheapening of silver.

I submit, therefore, if you take the facts of history and all human experience gained in the period preceding 1873, it is perfectly patent that the assertion you make, that the opening of our mints to the free coinage of silver would advance the price of silver in the markets of the world is an open, plain, and palpable non sequitur.

Now, let us turn to the other period, since 1873. In 1878 the value of silver was $1.11 an ounce. The Congress of the United States passed the Bland-Allison Act, which authorized and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver per month. The Secretary of the Treasury entered upon the performance of the office delegated to him. In 1879–80 the price of silver rose to $1.14, but notwithstanding the Treasury purchased silver from month to month and year to year in accordance with this law up until 1890, the next period to which I will call your attention, the price of silver uniformly and without a single break continued to go down. In 1890 it had fallen to 96 cents an ounce. In that year Congress passed an act authorizing and directing the purchase of four and a half million ounces of fine silver every month, and the Secretary of the Treasury proceeded, as in the other case, to the performance of his duty under the act. The price of silver, under the influence of this act, made a slight spurt and went to $1.04 an ounce. But it almost immediately fell again, and from that time down to the present it has never reached that figure, but has constantly and uniformly declined. The price of silver between 1878 and 1893 was as follows:

1879–80	1.14397	1885–86	1.03295	1891–92	.93723
1880–81	1.13508	1886–87	.98148	1892–93	.84263
1881–82	1.13817	1887–88	.95617	July	.72037
1882–83	1.11912	1888–89	.93510
1883–84	1.11529	1889–90	.96839

Now, under the act of 1878 and the act of 1890, until 1893, this Government had purchased nearly 460,000,000 fine ounces of silver, almost the entire American product. I believe I am safe in saying that, leaving out of consideration the last year, it was the entire American product. And yet those purchases by the Government were absolutely futile, not only to raise, but to maintain the price of silver, which, as I said, uniformly went down. But that is not all. You must remember that from 1870 to 1890 England, France, Germany, and the United States coined altogether $746,406,852, and this does not take into consideration the coinage of Mexico and the coinage of India, the figures of which I have not, but which I am told would aggregate at least $50,000,000 per year in addition, and still silver kept on falling in price notwithstanding.

Now I submit to you, I submit to any candid man, willing fairly to consider this question, whether in the light of these facts, whether in the light of the coinage by the European nations that I have named and the United States, to the extent of nearly one thousand million dollars, in the face of which the price of silver still went down—I submit to any candid man whether he can stand up here and say with any hope of being believed that the mere opening of the mints of the United States alone to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 will raise its price to an approximation with the price of gold. [Applause.]

Now, wholly aside from that, which is a matter of experience, a little calm deliberation and simple mathematical calculation will show the absurdity of the claim that legislation upon the part of the United States alone is sufficient to raise the gold price of silver. There is in the world to-day $3,500,000,000 worth of silver. The gentleman from Georgia who preceded me said there is $4,000,000,000 worth of silver. Every ounce of that silver is worth to-day 50 cents in the market and no more. The proposition of the free-silver advocate is that by an act of Congress we can add to the value of silver over $4,000,000,000. I ask you, in cold blood, was a more preposterous proposition ever submitted to the consideration of sane men?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's twenty-five minutes have expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I understood that I was to take the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to state to the House that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] would occupy twenty-five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to an hour, if he claims it.

Mr. DALZELL. I assume, Mr. Speaker, that the parties upon whom the burden of proof rests to establish their proposition that the opening of our mints will raise the price of silver to an approximation with that of gold must fail utterly in view of past experience and existing conditions.

I advance, then, to the second proposition. It is said that since 1873 there has been a fatal fall in the price of silver, concurrently with the price of all other commodities, and that the decline in the price of silver is the cause of the decline in the price of those other commodities. The method by which this proposition is sought to be sustained is to take a table of prominent articles of production and manufacture of various kinds, including silver, and, having fixed an index number at 100, to follow the prices through varying years and make a comparison; and it is contended that such a comparison establishes the fact that the fall in the price of silver, resulting from its demonetization, is the cause of the fall in the price of all these other commodities.

Now, I have here two tables which seem to me significant in their proof of several important facts. The first of these tables shows prices, wages, and purchasing power. It was compiled from the report of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, computed under the direction of Mr. Commissioner Carroll D. Wright. The prices shown in this table, as well as the prices in London, which are given in terms of gold, compiled by Mr. Augustus Sauerbeck, have been computed and compared, on the unit of 100 in 1860, by Professor Falconer, of Johns Hopkins University. Here is the first table:

Prices, wages, purchasing power.

The second table shows the fluctuation in the gold prices of forty-three articles of necessity which are in common use, comprising vegetable and animal food, tea, coffee, sugar, minerals, textile materials, and sundries, and this table was also compiled by Professor Falconer. It shows prices between 1846 and 1873, inclusive, in one table, and from 1873 to 1891, inclusive, in the other table, and is as follows:

1846 to 1873, inclusive.

1846	92.2	1856	102.8	1866	106.5
1847	97.9	1857	106.9	1867	103.9

1874	107	1881	88.5	1888	73.9
1875	100.3	1882	88	1889	76.7
1876	97.5	1883	86	1890	76
1877	97.4	1884	79.3	1891	75.4
1878	91.2	1885	75.4
1879	86.7	1886	72.4

These tables show, as I have said, several significant facts.

They show first that there was a fall in prices in 1849 to a price as low within a fraction as the average of 1890 and 1891. Then a rise, then a fall, then the great speculative rise and financial debauch in 1873, when English credit and goods began to be spread over the world in a way which has but lately culminated in the disastrous losses in Australia and South America. I read from the Forum of April, 1895:

It will be observed that there were greater fluctuations and variations in the course of prices and almost as great a fall at one period between 1846 and 1872, when the Latin Union was in existence, and silver was coined in France freely at the ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold, as there have been since silver was deprived of its full function of legal tender.

When each separate type of the 43 articles is dealt with year by year, it is found that a few have risen since 1873, others have fallen but little, others greatly, others have varied from year to year, but there is no sign of any influence causing a steady tendency to depression, such as is asserted by the so-called bimetallists.

Since 1873 there have been less fluctuations than before, rather an orderly reduction in most prices, varying slightly with the difference in seasons in each year, but corresponding closely with reduction in cost. This beneficial fall has been accompanied by a corresponding or correlative rise in wages—greater in the United States than in any European States. Since 1873, under the influence of peace and the stability of the gold unit of value, this beneficent fall in prices has also been accompanied by a vast development of international commerce.

I apprehend, therefore, that so far as this branch of the subject is concerned the tables upon which the friends of free silver rely are utterly valueless to prove any concurrence of causes in the fall of silver and the fall of commodities. The truth is that no more patent humbug by way of alleged logic was ever attempted to be palmed upon a credulous people than this pretended parallellism between the decline of commodity prices and the price of silver. A list of commodities is prepared. It is shown that throughout a series of years they have declined in price. During the same years silver has declined in price. Therefore it is said the decline in price of these articles is due to the decline in price of silver. And, mark you, between the percentage of silver decline and the percentage of the commodity decline there is not the slightest correspondence. Was there ever a more absurd non sequitur? Why, by that method I can prove to you that the decline of all these articles was caused by the decline of any one of them. For instance, from 1873 till this date meat has fallen in price. But during the same period other food, cloths and clothing, fuel and lighting have also declined in price; therefore the decline in price of meat has been the cause of the decline in price of foods, cloths and clothing, fuel and lighting—a manifest absurdity.

It has been suggested that it is a poor rule that will not work both ways, and I borrow the suggestion: "Silver was demonetized; wages have risen, corn has risen, so have pork, and leather, and many other things; therefore the demonetization of silver is the cause of the rise in prices."

Now, to recur to our tables: They show, in the second place, what? They show that there has been a uniform decline in the cost of the necessaries of life and a uniform increase in the wages of labor. I know of no man outside of the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver who complains of the fall in the price of the necessaries of life and the increase in the wages of labor. I know of no man whose wail is heard because of the fall in prices of wheat, grains, food, cloth, clothing, and the implements of husbandry and of trade and all that go to minister to the comfort, the health, and the needs of every man, rich and poor, in his own home, except the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. [Applause.] To my mind the decrease in the cost of the necessaries of life and the increase in the wages of labor indicate not depression but prosperity. They indicate to my mind that condition of things which tends to increase savings-bank deposits, to build workingmen's houses, to bring American men and women up to the standard of American civilization. [Applause.] The fact is that there is not the remotest paralellism between the movement of circulation and prices. Commodities in general are less than 8 per cent below the level of 1860, while silver is 50 per cent below it.

Aside from that altogether, and I may not stop to go at any length into a discussion of this proposition, for my time is passing rapidly—aside from that altogether there is not a single staple article that has fallen in price where the decline can not be traced to causes wholly apart from any money question, where it can not be traced to material changes in the cost of production and distribution.

The progress of invention, improved machinery and improved processes, reduced rates of transportation, enlarged competition, and other causes, with which the demonetization of silver has not the remotest connection, furnish easy explanation of reduced prices. Why, I was astounded to hear out of the mouth of a gentleman [Mr. TOWNE] who has evidently studied this subject with a great deal of care, the assertion that the period of invention antedated 1873, and that inventions had nothing substantial to do with the decline of prices for the last twenty years. I have in my hand a paper furnished me by the Commissioner of Patents.

That paper is as follows:

Number of patents issued by the United States and foreign countries in the periods 1850–1869 and 1870–1889, inclusive.

Countries.	1850-1869.	1870-1889.
United States	91,479	320,205
Austria	10,418	39,605
Belgium	26,698	49,581
Canada	3,254	34,026
Denmark	386	1,593
Finland	94	226
France	79,059	114,567
German Empire, including Baden, Bavaria, Prussia, Saxony, and Wurtemberg	7,166	58,355
Great Britain	38,416	104,149
Italy, including Sardinia	3,741	20,267
India	445	2,564
New Zealand	71	2,482
Queensland	55	2,413
Russia	974	2,962
South Australia	122	898
Victoria	751	3,732
Total	263,129	757,625

You will observe that during the first period there were issued 263,129 patents; during the second period there were issued 757,625 patents, or three times as many as during the earlier period. [Applause.] I have had furnished me by the Commissioner of Patents a mass of information which I have not had an opportunity to digest, but I find the following among the many subjects covered by patents since the year 1873: The entire system and device of electric lighting, heating, and furnishing motive power is a product of this period. Telephony also is a product of this period. Telegraphy has been improved within this period with the effect of largely reducing its cost. The harvesting of grain has been revolutionized. The manufacture of shoes has been revolutionized. Immense strides have been made in the improvement of railways and their equipment. Witness the automatic air brake. Milling, knitting, weaving, printing—in all these money-saving inventions have been multiplied. And so I might go on, if I had the time, and call your attention to various others of those inventions which have done so much to reduce the price of the necessaries of life. But outside altogether of the Patent Office, there is no gentleman here who, if he will give his mind to the subject for a moment, will not recall the ingenious processes by which the cost of production and distribution has been lessened. Why, in one year, as I am told, by the utilization of cotton seed, formerly a waste, $40,000,000 was saved to go to lessen the cost of the production of cotton.

Any gentleman who will think of it for a moment will recollect the fall in the price of the coal oil that is burned to-day, that is burned in every household at an insignificant cost, as compared with its cost fifteen years ago. Now the by-products of that oil constitute in themselves a wealth far beyond the estimated wealth of the oil as it was originally used. Why, by means of various labor-saving machines we have advanced the manufacture of steel in this country until now in the city which I have the honor to represent we claim the ability to compete with the world in its manufacture, and these machines are the product, in large part, of the last twenty-five years of invention. [Applause.]

Look at the reduction in transportation rates. Let me show you just for a second. In 1865 the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and its lines west of Pittsburg, the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the Michigan Central, Boston and Albany, the New York, Lake Erie and Western carried 11,151,701 tons of freight, or, to express it in another way, moved of tons 1 mile 1,654,324,000. And how much did each ton cost for carriage? It cost 2.9 cents per mile. In 1885, twenty years afterwards, this same system of railroads moved of tons at the rate of 1 mile 11,331,306,000, at a cost of six-tenths of a cent a mile.

Now, these railway lines carried somewhat less than one-fourth of the tons moved 1 mile in 1885, yet they saved on the difference between cost of carriage in 1885 and the cost of carriage in 1865 $256,500,000. I might pursue this line of argument, to show the same results, with other roads, but it is not necessary.

In the face of facts like these, gentlemen will assert on this floor that the falling prices are due, not to these elements of modern civilization, but to the demonetization of silver, "the legislative crime of 1873." [Laughter and applause.]

Nor is the fall in prices due to any disuse of silver as money. In 1860 the world's coin consisted of $3,400,000,000. In 1894, thirty-four years after, the value of the world's coin had increased to $8,031,000,000.

Nor is the fall in prices due to the disuse of silver in the United States. The silver coinage prior to 1873, in the first eighty years of our history, amounted to only one hundred and forty million and odd dollars. In the eighteen years that succeeded the "legislative crime of 1873" silver was coined to the extent of $491,000,000 in round numbers. From 1792 up to 1873 there were only eight million and some odd silver dollars coined. In 1873 our per capita allowance of money was a little over $18; in 1896 it is over $23. So that it is perfectly apparent that neither the disuse of silver in the coinage of the world nor the limitation of the use of silver in the United States can by any possibility have had any connection with the decline in the prices of commodities.

Now, coupled with the assertion that there has been a fall in the price of silver is the qualification that that fall has been a fatal fall, that enterprise has been discouraged, that business interests have been destroyed, and that there has been a period of general and universal depression. I deny it utterly. I assert that the period from 1873 to the present, barring only the year 1893, when a panic was caused by the apprehension of a silver craze, is the most remarkably prosperous period in all our history. Let me call attention only to one or two facts. From 1850 to 1870 our national wealth increased from $7,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000, but in the succeeding twenty years, from 1870 to 1890, it made the astounding increase of $35,000,000,000. During that same period, up to the time when, under a Democratic Administration, we ceased to pay our debts and began to borrow again, we had paid of our interest-bearing debt $1,100,000,000. Think of it! In this period of business depression and a fatal fall of prices this American people paid off $1,100,000,000 of their interest-bearing debt. All the statistics of our industrial history show increased wealth, the lightening of the burden of debt upon the individual, and a greater consumption of the necessaries and luxuries of life. I unhesitatingly assert that that is true which Mr. Harrison said in his last message to Congress prior to his retirement from the Presidency. He said:

> A comparison of existing conditions with those of the most favored period in our history will show that a higher degree of prosperity and a more general diffusion of the comforts of wealth were never enjoyed by our people.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], the ex-Speaker of this House, who preceded me in this discussion, asserted in substance that the period from 1850 to 1860 was the high-water mark of the prosperity of this country. I will answer him by quoting from President Buchanan's message to Congress in 1857. He then used this significant language:

> The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly, and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and up till within a brief period our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture, and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced, while the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount. Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people. With this the Government can not fail deeply to sympathize, though it may be without the power to extend relief.

I fear that my friend from Georgia will find himself without corroboration in the record of his country's history.

I do not stop to dwell upon the argument made in favor of free coinage in the interest of the debtor class. The gentleman who preceded me [Mr. TURNER of Georgia] has dealt with one aspect of that question, the aspect which has relation to the homely maxim that "honesty is the best policy." It is fashionable to denounce wealth and banks and capitalists, gold bugs and Wall street; but this is simply the language of the demagogue; it is not logic, it is not argument, it is not reason, and it is deserving of nothing but reprehension and contempt from honest men. The man who has borrowed a gold dollar and seeks to cancel his debt by the return of a silver one—two of which the gold dollar will buy—is not honest, and legislation in his interest, unless it be legislation to reform him or punish him, is vicious legislation.

But there is a world of misconception and misrepresentation included in the term debtor class.

I deny that in this country there is any debtor class as such.

The man who is creditor to-day is debtor to-morrow, and if there be any class that is particularly a creditor class at all times it is the class composed of those who, at the end of every week or every two weeks, march up in our great establishments to sign the pay rolls and receive the money for which the great capitalists of the country stand their debtors. I would be false to the interests of my constituents if I did not stand here for sound money for the wage earner. He is entitled to have a dollar of full debt-paying power.

I shall not stop now to discuss at length the question as to the effect upon this country of changing our monetary system from a system such as now prevails to that which would prevail if we minted 50-cent dollars. There is one startling fact, vouched for by all history, and that is, that wherever there is good money and bad money, or better money and worse money, the bad money and the worse money stay and the good money goes. This is pursuant to a law that is called Gresham's law, but it is the law of common sense, it is the law of human selfishness, for no man will pay a debt with a dollar in gold when he can pay it with a dollar in silver, two of which the gold dollar will buy. The first result, therefore, of free coinage would be the contraction of our currency by the withdrawal of all our gold, six hundred millions and more.

There are 20,000,000 wage earners in this country who would be affected by the introduction of a debased dollar. There are savings-banks deposits to the amount of nearly $2,000,000,000. There are members of building and loan associations whose investments in gold would be paid in depreciated silver. There are life-insurance policy holders to the extent of over $5,000,000,000, all of whose policies would be paid in debased currency. Then there are the pensioners of the United States. One hundred and sixty million dollars went to them in the past year, all of which they would have been obliged to receive in this debased currency if it had prevailed. Free silver coinage would mean a radical change of existing contractual relations, ruin to business, a wreck of values and of credit, and an introduction to an era of disaster the like of which we have never heretofore known. This country would become the dumping ground of the silver of the world. Not to prolong this discussion further, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the parties upon whom rests the burden of proof have furnished us no reason why we should embark upon this unknown and uncertain sea, with no port in sight and no chart or compass to direct our course. I submit that our salvation and prosperity call us to abide by the ancient landmarks, and that there alone our safe course lies.

Mr. Speaker, I do not fear or anticipate the success of the cause of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. For weeks and months an educated public intelligence directed to the subject has been making that cause more and more hopeless; but, if it ever did have any remaining hope, it died yesterday an unnatural death, slain by the hands of its own friends in the face of a delighted country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, what this country wants is not more free silver coinage. What it wants is more revenues through the custom houses [applause], more men in the mines, more blazing furnaces, more factories, more mills, the music of more spindles, more and cheaper transportation facilities, a wider field for labor, an enlarged home market, more consumption to stimulate production, to increase wages, and to decrease the hours of labor. These are the things we need and must have, and will have, in our onward march to the conquest of our manifest destiny as the leader of the world in agriculture, in manufactures, and in a commerce whose lifeblood shall be a monetary system good as gold the world over and as respected as the national flag. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the pending motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, is it not in order now to ask a vote first on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. DINGLEY. After the Committee of the Whole recommends nonconcurrence? Should not the question be on the recommendation of the committee? I suppose it makes no practical difference, but it occurs to me that the question before the House now should be on the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman will see that if the vote be taken in the House on the motion to concur, the negative of that motion would be the affirmative of the motion to disagree.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly. If it is more convenient I have no objection to that method. I ask unanimous consent that the question be taken on concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CRISP. That is practically the same thing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine, that the question be taken on concurring in the Senate amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on concurring in the Senate amendment; and there were—yeas 90, nays 215, not voting 50; as follows:

Mr. WOODMAN with Mr. MCDEARMON.

Mr. LEONARD with Mr. STALLINGS.

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut with Mr. KYLE.

Mr. HANLY with Mr. PENDLETON.

Mr. POWERS with Mr. COBB of Alabama.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. HOWARD.

Mr. ADAMS with Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. HOWARD is absent on account of serious sickness. I am requested to state that if he were present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. SULZER. My colleague, Mr. MINER of New York, is absent. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. WILSON of New York is confined to his room by sickness. If presen, the would vote "no."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. My colleague Mr. ARNOLD is seriously ill at his house. If present he, would vote "no." I wish also to state that my colleague Mr. HUFF, and my colleague Mr. WOOMER, who is detained by an accident, are both absent. If present, they would vote "no."

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleagues, Mr. FOSS, Mr. LORIMER, and Mr. BELKNAP, are detained from the House by unavoidable reasons. I am authorized to state, inasmuch as they were unable to secure a pair, that if present, they would vote "no."

Mr. MERCER. My colleagues, Mr. HAINER and Mr. MEIKLEJOHN, are absent. Mr. MEIKLEJOHN has a pair, but I was unable to secure a pair for Mr. HAINER. If they were present, I am requested to state, both of them would vote in the negative.

Mr. AITKEN. My colleague, Mr. LINTON, was called away on account of sickness, and I wish to have him excused on this vote.

Mr. BENNETT. My colleague, Mr. FOOTE, is unavoidably detained from the House. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. DALZELL. My colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, is detained by illness. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. CHICKERING. My colleague, Mr. BLACK, is absent. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. MORSE, is absent from the House on account of sickness. If present, he would vote in the negative.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. My colleague, Mr. EDDY, is absent by appointment of the Speaker to attend the funeral of the late Mr. Crain of Texas. He is paired with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOWARD], and if present would vote in the negative.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, my friend, Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania, left here, I am informed, with the understanding that he was paired with myself on this question. If present, he would vote "no." I voted "aye," as I had no arrangement with him for a pair, and did not consent to it. He did not speak personally to me on the subject, of course.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HENRY, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. STEELE. I desire to make the same announcement with reference to Mr. HANLY.

Mr. McMILLIN. My colleague, Mr. McDEARMON, is absent by direction of the House. If present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. MEYER. My colleague, Mr. BUCK, has been called home on important business. He endeavored to secure a pair, but failed to do so. Were he present, he would vote "no."

Mr. TUCKER. My colleague, Mr. ELLETT, is detained by illness. If present, he would vote "no."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CLARKE, is now at his home in Alabama fighting for sound money. If present, he would maintain the same position on this floor and vote "no" on the present proposition.

Mr. PICKLER. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS]. If present, he would vote "no," and I should vote "aye."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My colleagues from Missouri, Mr. MOZLEY and Mr. RANEY, are absent from the House. I desire to say that if present, they would vote "no" on the pending question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, at the earliest day practicable, from electrotype plates to be furnished to the Public Printer by the within-named association wholly without cost to the Government, 3,000 copies, in separate form, of the Proceedings of the First Annual Convention of the International Deep Waterways Association, for circulation, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

A concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and hereby is, directed to eliminate from 10,000 copies of the Report on the Statistics of Agriculture in the United States, Census of 1890, the monograph entitled "Report on agriculture by irrigation in the western part of the United States"; that he be authorized to print an appendix, the data for which shall be furnished by the Interior Department, bringing the water-supply information up to date, and an index; and that he bind the monograph thus enlarged in one volume in style uniform with the other final Census reports; that of this report on irrigation 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,500 copies shall be for the use of the House, and 1,500 copies for distribution by the Department of the Interior.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 129) for the relief of Capt. George H. Perkins; and

A bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1442) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota";

A bill (H. R. 4810) extending the time within which the Maryland and Washington Railway Company shall be required to complete the building of the road of said company under the provisions of an act of Congress approved August 1, 1892, as amended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1895; and

A bill (H. R. 2654) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby requested to return to the House Senate bill 879 for the correction of a verbal error.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota;

A bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona;

A bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution; and

A bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 54) authorizing the National Dredging Company to proceed with the work of dredging the channel of Mobile Harbor, under the direction of the Secretary of War;

Joint resolution (S. R. 65) to print the annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service;

A bill (S. 824) to require patents to be issued to land actually settled under the act entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of Florida," approved August 4, 1842;

A bill (S. 1320) to confirm the title to certain lands in William Morgan and Harrison Moore, and to require the issue of patents therefor;

A bill (S. 1693) for the rebuilding or repair of the public wharf at Sitka, Alaska; and

A bill (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that the urgent deficiency bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and, if necessary, that an order be made that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the urgent deficiency bill, which has just been received from the Senate, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years;

Joint resolution (S. R. 39) making an appropriation to defray the joint expense of locating the boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and the British North American territory;

Joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida; and

A bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, providing a chaplain for the Military Academy.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following bills and resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 129) for the relief of Capt. George H. Perkins—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and hereby is, directed to eliminate from 10,000 copies of the Report on the Statistics of Agriculture in the United States, Census of 1890, the monograph entitled "Report on agriculture by irrigation in the Western part of the United States;" that he be authorized to print an appendix, the data for which shall be furnished by the Interior Department, bringing the water-supply information up to date, and an index; and that he bind the monograph thus enlarged in one volume in style uniform with the other final Census reports; that of this report on irrigation 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 5,500 copies shall be for the use of the House, and 1,500 copies for distribution by the Department of the Interior—

To the Committee on Printing.

A concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office at the earliest day practicable, from electrotype plates to be furnished to the Public Printer by the within-named association wholly without cost to the Government, 3,000 copies, in separate form, of the Proceedings of the First Annual Convention of the International Deep Waterways Association, for circulation, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—

To the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of Congress, a communication from the Secretary of State, covering the report of the Director of the Bureau of American Republics for the year 1895.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SPENCER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WALSH, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRUMM, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. JENKINS, for one day, on account of sickness.

And then (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Speaker announced the House in recess, under the rule, until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., resumed its session, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report clause 3 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, under the special order.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes none.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

KATE A. PITMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Kate A. Pitman, widow of George Pitman, late a private in Company C, One hundred and second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay her $12 per month, the same to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that we commence with the first case on the Private Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. This bill was pending at the last session of the committee.

A MEMBER. Let the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report has been read.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I made a few suggestions on this bill two weeks ago to-night. I think I am correct in my belief that this is the case.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, this is the case.

Mr. LOUD. On that evening I took occasion to state that the soldier in this case had reenlisted after the war in the Regular Army, and the assumption was that he was then in sound bodily health. I asked any gentleman on this floor to produce evidence to the contrary. Some gentleman did rise and state that there was an abundance of proof that this man had died as the result of disability incurred in the service. I could not see how it could be, so I took occasion to go to the Pension Office, and I find that the facts in this case are that this widow never claimed that her husband died as the result of service, but she made application simply under the law of 1890, under which, if she could prove that she was married to this soldier, she would be entitled to $8 a month. Now, simply because there seems to be some defect in the proof of this woman's marriage, the Committee on Invalid Pensions come into the House and recommend that she receive $12 a month.

Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. The House can of course accept my statement in such manner as it sees fit; but I assume the position that no pension of this character shall pass this House while I am present, giving the woman more than $8 a month, unless you produce a quorum to pass it. This is one of those cases. If you will reduce the amount to $8 a month I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill and reported it as the subcommittee of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. So far as I am concerned, I do not desire the House to pass the bill upon my judgment as to what the evidence on file in the Pension Office shows. What the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] states is true, that the widow made an application under the law of 1890, a thing that had not been brought to my attention until I investigated it a little more, as the gentleman himself has done. But I put it upon a broader ground than that. I understand, and every gentleman here understands, that the general pension laws and rates were fixed upon averages and to apply to general classes, and everybody understands that in making up these general classes some soldiers get less than they ought to have, and some perhaps get more. My proposition is that every bill that comes in this House ought to stand upon its inherent merits.

This is a peculiar case. This widow is now afflicted with a fatal malady. While the report perhaps does not show that fact, yet I know from current rumor that her life can not be prolonged beyond a few months. She lives in the same town in which I live, and in that way I know the facts.

The record shows that this soldier served his country six years, three years in the war of the rebellion and three years in the Regular Army, defending the pioneers of Western civilization against the ravages of the Indians.

Now, if the gentleman from California thinks it is his patriotic duty to raise the question of no quorum here, why, as a matter of policy, I will consent to have the bill amended so as to reduce the amount to $8 a month, but it certainly is not that justice to which this widow is entitled. With the concurrence of the committee, I would rather have this bill amended so as to give her $8 a month now than to take the chance of having it passed at a higher rate at a later date in the session.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman who made this report state whether the paragraph in the report which I am about to read refers to the woman who is now claiming this pension? It says:

A comrade who testifies that he was with the soldier on his way home makes affidavit that there was no marriage of Pitman to this woman. It seems that the soldier picked up this woman and lived with her a short time. After Pitman and this woman lived together a short time, the evidence shows a man came from the South, claimed her as his wife, and she went away with him and has never been heard of since.

Do those remarks apply to the woman who is now claiming this pension, or do they apply to the woman whom this man took out a license to marry?

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] was present during the discussion in the committee, and he must be aware of the facts—that is, I suppose the gentleman was present during the discussion. I stated the other night that there was no question in the Pension Department about the soldier having died from disability incurred in the service. What I ought to have stated, perhaps, is that there was no question raised upon that subject in the Pension Department, but the claim was rejected upon the ground, as stated, that there was not satisfactory evidence that this woman had been legally married to the soldier. Now, the facts in relation to that are substantially as follows: When this soldier came out of the Regular Army, in 1870, he came back to his home, at Mansfield, Ohio, with a woman who lived there with him a brief time. At the end of that time a man came from the South claiming her as his wife, and she went away with him. In two or three years after that he was married to this claimant, the last woman.

There is no question as to the validity of that marriage if the soldier was not married to the woman I have mentioned as having gone away. Now, the only evidence tending to show that he may have been married to that woman was found upon the records of the probate court of Montgomery County, Ohio, showing that a license had been issued to Josiah G. Pitman and Helen Joiner, but there was no evidence that there had been a consummation of the marriage, and the name of the soldier was George Pitman. It is shown by the records of the Pension Department that there was a very thorough examination made of the case by special examinations, and that the special examiners had been directed to try to find this woman and to find out from her whether she had been married to the soldier.

The evidence shows that after two or three years of special examination they found the woman, or some woman who bore the same name that this woman bore, in a house of ill fame somewhere in Georgia. The investigation was prosecuted through the police force and the postmasters in Georgia very largely, and upon finding the location of this woman, instead of investigating the matter and interviewing her to find out what the facts were, and whether she had been married to the soldier, they dropped the examination, and the special examiner reported the case with the recommendation that it be rejected. I claim that there is no evidence that any court of justice would consider sufficient to annul the marriage between the soldier and this woman who claims to be his widow. There was no evidence in the report that this other marriage to which reference has been made was consummated, and the marriage laws of Ohio require every officer or minister to make a return, and that return has to be recorded. There was simply the issuing of a license that only allowed or permitted them to get married; but there is no evidence that they did get married, nor did it appear that this was the same party.

Mr. ERDMAN. Does the gentleman say that when the license was taken out for the marriage there was an actual consummation of the marriage?

Mr. KERR. No, sir. It was found that this license that I speak of had been issued, but there was no return.

Mr. ERDMAN. Was the marriage ever solemnized?

Mr. KERR. The evidence of a comrade shows beyond any doubt that he accompanied him from the time of his discharge from the Regular Army until he reached his home. He testifies that in several affidavits and before the special examiner that he was with the soldier during the time until he reached home, and there was never any marriage between him and this woman.

Mr. ERDMAN. For a space of between two and three weeks there appears to have been a consummation of the marriage, according to the testimony of this comrade:

After Pittman and this woman lived together a short time the evidence shows that a man from the South claimed her as his wife and she went away with him and has never been heard of since.

Mr. KERR. There is no question about that.

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, now, am I to understand there was a license issued and a consummation of the marriage?

Mr. KERR. No. I say that under the laws of Ohio that would not be a consummation of the marriage to the extent of annulling a subsequent legally solemnized marriage. It would as to property rights have the same purpose as to annul.

Mr. MILES. The gentleman hardly means to annul, but to avoid.

Mr. PICKLER. As the gentleman has indicated that he will accept it, I move to amend in line 7 by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting the word "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. I move to strike out section 2.

Mr. ERDMAN. Let that be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage.

Mr. PICKLER. Under the general law these special acts take effect after passage, and that is surplusage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY H. SCHRAWDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of Henry H. Schrawder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Henry H. Schrawder, late a member of Company E, Second Battalion, Fifteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge; and the proceedings of court-martial finding him guilty of absence without leave and desertion are hereby vacated and set aside.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report and accompanying letter of General Ruggles, Adjutant-General, be read.

The report (by Mr. MCCLELLAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of Henry H. Schrawder, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report as follows:

It appears that the charge of desertion and conviction thereof and conviction of absence without leave were all founded in error.

The Adjutant-General of the Army, as will be seen from the accompanying letter, recommends that the soldier's record be cleared by legislation, as the War Department has no jurisdiction in the case.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 20, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith bill H. R. 6305, Fifty-third Congress, second session, for the relief of Henry H. Schrawder, also letter from the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, United States, and to report as follows:

The records of this office show that Private Henry H. Schrawder enlisted November 1, 1862, in Company E, Second Battalion, Fifteenth Infantry; was admitted to hospital July 11, 1864; furloughed September 17, 1864, for thirty days; furlough extended to October 27, 1864; that on October 17, 1864, he was arrested at Harrisburg, Pa., brought before a general court-martial, and charged with having deserted on October 6, 1864; that he pleaded guilty; that his plea was confirmed by the court; that he was found guilty and sentenced to forfeit all pay, bounty, etc., due or to become due, etc., and fifteen days after promulgation of sentence to be confined at hard labor at Clinton Prison, Dannemora, N. Y., for two years and six months (General Court-Martial Order, No. 48, Department of the East, June 8, 1868); that he was released from prison and dishonorably discharged September 13, 1865, by Special Order 473, Adjutant-General's Office, series 1865, and that so much of the order as required that discharge be dishonorable was subsequently revoked.

Upon investigation of this case in 1891, on a call from the Commissioner of Pensions, the following notation was placed on the records by direction of the Adjutant-General of the Army:

"The findings of guilty of absence without leave and desertion were reached by the court without a full knowledge of the facts in the case, as the records of this office show Private Schrawder received a contusion of the head from shell in the battle of Kenesaw Mountain, June 28, 1864, and was sent to general hospital on that day; entered Brown General Hospital, Louisville, Ky., June 11, 1864, with anæmia hemiralopia; was furloughed September 7, 1864, for thirty days and furlough extended to October 27, 1864; that he entered post hospital Fort Adams, Newport, R. I., November 6, 1864, with eruption of skin, and was returned to duty November 26, 1864. He was then held in confinement at Fort Adams, R. I., awaiting trial for desertion, which took place April 4, 1865.

"The above shows that, although found guilty of absence without leave from June 24, 1864, to August 27, 1864, he was wounded in battle at Kenesaw Mountain June 28, 1864, and from that date to date of trial was under military control, either in hospital or on furlough, or in confinement awaiting trial; that although found guilty of desertion from October 6, 1864, on furlough which was extended to October 27, 1864, and therefore improperly charged with desertion. As the man has, however, been convicted of absence without leave and desertion by a general court-martial, the Department has no power to set aside the findings, etc., of the court-martial, which have been executed."

From this notation on the rolls it appears that the charge of desertion and conviction thereof and conviction of absence without leave were all founded in error. It is therefore recommended that, to do justice to the soldier, his record be cleared by legislation of these wrongful charges and convictions.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I scarcely think that it is necessary to add anything. The letter of General Ruggles shows that the soldier was suffering from contusion of his head and was virtually out of his mind when under the charge of desertion, and pleaded guilty under a misapprehension. In view of the recommendation of General Ruggles, I have been unanimously instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the bill to the House favorably.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

RUFUS BETZ.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2048) for the relief of Rufus Betz.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be not had at this time, but that it be laid aside for consideration later.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

THOMAS HOLADAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2326) granting a pension to Thomas Holaday.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the invalid pension roll the name of Thomas Holaday, late a private in Company C, Kimball's regiment Missouri Volunteer State Militia, subject to the limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $24 per month.

The report (by Mr. CROWTHER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2326) to pension Thomas Holaday, having considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

The evidence before the committee upon investigation shows that Thomas Holaday was pensioned June 2, 1885, by certificate No. 298904, at $2 per month from April 4, 1862, for rheumatism; increased to $8 per month from December 16, 1885; increased to $16 per month from June 26, 1889. The pensioner's name was dropped from the rolls February 28, 1890, on the ground that "he was erroneously pensioned. The company and regiment to which he belonged was a State organization, not in the service of the General Government, and the disabilities incurred therein are not and were not then pensionable under existing laws."

It is not denied that the disabilities from which Mr. Holaday suffers (his limbs being drawn out of shape, and confined to his bed, and helpless a portion of the time) are not of service origin; neither is it denied that these disabilities were incurred while performing service in defense of his country; but because of a mere technical difference of opinion as to whether his service was performed in State or national forces, he is dropped from the pension roll in his old age, when he is helpless and dependent, at a time when the strong arm of a generous Government should be his shield and protector.

Your committee are of the unanimous opinion that while there may be differences as to the kind of service, there are none that the services were not faithfully performed and the disabilities incurred therein; hence, if there be error, your committee prefer to err upon the side of humanity and duty and give the pensioner the benefit of the doubt. We therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

After the last word in the printed bill insert:

"Provided, That the pension herein granted shall be paid to Thomas Holaday, and that no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on concurring in the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad if the gentleman in charge of this bill would make a statement.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered by a subcommittee of which I was the chairman. There is no doubt whatever that this man's disabilities are pensionable. There is no doubt but that he performed the service, and there is no question but that he was upon the pension roll, placed there by General Black when he was Pension Commissioner. But a subsequent Pension Commissioner in investigating pension cases discovered that there might be a probability that this unfortunate citizen was on the pension roll by mistake, and he was dropped from the roll, as the report states, not because he had not rendered the service, but because there was some technical reason found why he should not be there. The citizens of Missouri have always contended that the pension laws of the United States provided for the Missouri State Militia. On March 3, 1879, there was passed a bill which contains this provision:

The provisions of existing pension laws are hereby extended to the officers and privates of the Missouri State Militia.

A joint resolution was passed by the Fifty-third Congress extending the provisions of the law of 1890 to the Missouri State Militia. There is no necessity, Mr. Chairman, to go back and explain why it was necessary for the Missouri State Militia to be employed in the service of the General Government. Every citizen of this country who knows the history of the unfortunate period between 1861 and 1865 knows the services that were performed by that militia. It is not necessary for me to state here that there was an agreement between President Lincoln on the one hand and Governor Gamble of the State of Missouri on the other. That agreement, a copy of which I hold in my possession, was signed and sealed by the parties thereto. Under that agreement these various militia organizations were placed in the service of the General Government under the command of United States officers, and in most cases they were paid by the General Government.

Now, for this nation, at this time, when the few of these men who are left are old and decrepit, some of them in the last stage of disease, many of them unfortunately so disabled as to be unable to earn their livelihood—for this nation, I say, at this time, to take advantage of any technicality whereby the small stipend that has been given to them every month in order that the wolf might be kept from the door is taken away from them, is an act that ought to be condemned by every citizen on the soil of the United States. I, sir, am in favor of granting a pension to every man, I care not who he is, that bore an arm in the defense of his country and its flag. I do not care whether he served in the militia or in the Regular Army or in the volunteer forces of this nation; it is sufficient for me to know that he was a follower of the flag and a defender of the nation's principles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, according to the report of the Pension Bureau, we find that this citizen was pensioned first at $2 per month, but that in about eight months the pension was increased——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him whether there is a minority report in this case?

Mr. CROWTHER. No, sir, there is not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I feel ready to vote upon it. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, in this case I had an investigation made by the pension authorities, and I am advised as follows:

In the matter of the bill No. 2326, to restore to the pension rolls the name of Thomas Holaday, late of Company C, Kimball's Regiment, Sixth Missouri State Militia, Volunteer Cavalry.

It appears from the records of the War Department, on file in the Pension Office, that Kimball's regiment of six months' militia was purely a State organization, never mustered into the United States service, and never classified as a part of the volunteer forces of the United States, and hence its members possess no title to pensions and never did have any except under the provisions of the paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and that restricts the right to pensions for disability incurred while in the State militia and not in the United States service to such persons as establish their claims prior to July 14, 1874.

Mr. CROWTHER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CROWTHER. If this was a purely State Militia organization, how does it happen that all of the rolls of the organization are on file in the War Department?

Mr. ERDMAN. I do not understand that that establishes any point whatever in the case, and certainly not that which the gentleman claims it establishes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Did this organization perform service for the Government under command of officers of the General Government?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ERDMAN. Suppose it did——

Mr. NORTHWAY. I am asking the question for information. Did it in fact perform service for the General Government under the command of officers of the Government?

Mr. ERDMAN. I am not advised on that point.

Mr. PICKLER. It did. That is the fact.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Now, if that is so, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to a man's being granted a pension who had served in that militia if he was disabled?

Mr. ERDMAN. Unless all of that command were treated in the same manner, I would.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If they were injured in the service you would grant them a pension, would you not?

Mr. ERDMAN. Provided all of them were injured; but I do not want any one or two or three picked out for special favors.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You would deny a pension to one man who applied for it because all of the same command did not apply!

Mr. ERDMAN. No, sir; but I say let them all wait until they all get it together.

A MEMBER. They will be dead. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. This man was erroneously placed on the rolls, and General Raum, who will hardly be claimed as unfriendly to the United States soldier, took his name off the roll.

Mr. FARIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ERDMAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FARIS. Is it not true that the error that is alleged to exist in the case of this soldier is that he was a member of the Missouri Militia instead of a member of the United States forces?

Mr. ERDMAN. No, sir; it did not assume that shape.

Mr. FARIS. Then what is it?

Mr. ERDMAN. That he never was mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. FARIS. That is because he was a member of the Missouri State Militia, and the law read by the gentleman from Missouri shows the militia to be pensionable.

Mr. ERDMAN. And they were not pensionable.

Now, if you are going to pension all of this regiment I will vote, I think, with you; but I do not wish to pick out special cases.

Mr. NORTHWAY. For my own part every man in the service will receive my vote for a pension if he is entitled to it, no matter what his service was.

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, he will receive mine as a class, but I do not wish to pick up special individuals and grant them particular favors.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will remember that promise hereafter.

Mr. ERDMAN. I will.

But there is another serious objection to me with reference to this bill. It proposes to grant arrears of pension.

Mr. PICKLER. Not at all.

Mr. CROWTHER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it does not.

Mr. ERDMAN. Then what does this proviso mean:

Provided, That the pension herein granted shall be paid to Thomas Holaday, and that no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid.

Mr. TRACEY. That does not give arrearages.

Mr. ERDMAN. He was indebted to the Government before the passage of the bill, and if you deduct the pension you propose to grant him it certainly is the granting of arrears.

Mr. PICKLER. On our theory, and the theory of the committee, he did not owe the Government anything. We contend that he was disabled in the service, that he was entitled to the pension, and if he was erroneously dropped from the rolls he ought to have the pension allowed to him, or, in other words, restored to the rolls without deducting anything on any such claim as that. He was disabled in the service and is entitled to the pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ERDMAN) there were—ayes 83, noes 0.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). There are 116 members present, a quorum. The motion is agreed to, and the bill is laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The Chair desires to state, however, that there is a committee amendment that was overlooked. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the last word in the printed bill insert: "Provided, The pension herein granted shall be paid to Thomas Holaday, and that no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the committee amendment will be considered as adopted.

Mr. ERDMAN. I object.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would it be in order to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid aside?

Mr. PAYNE. That can not be done in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HILL. I make the point that the vote has not been announced.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote was announced.

Mr. PAYNE. The correction, Mr. Chairman, can be made in the House. It is not necessary to make it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York is correct; and the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

RACHEL PATTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1185) granting a pension to Rachel Patton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rachel Patton, of Paris, Edgar County, Ill., formerly the widow of John H. Patton, late captain of Company C, Seventy-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1185) granting a pension to Rachel Patton, report as follows:

The committee has fully considered the evidence submitted, and find that the claimant was the widow of Capt. John H. Patton, late Company C, Seventy-ninth Illinois, who was killed in battle at Liberty Gap, Tennessee, June 25, 1863.

Claimant was pensioned as his widow on December 15, 1863, under the general law, at $20 per month. She drew this pension until September 30, 1875, when she was dropped from the rolls by reason of her remarriage to one William G. Culbertson.

On March 29, 1889, by decree of circuit court of Edgar County, Ill., claimant was divorced from said Culbertson on account of his willful abandonment and desertion of her, and by decree of said court she was permitted to resume her former name of Rachel Patton.

Claimant is 63 years of age; feeble in health, unable to work; is in receipt of an income of $175 per year, which is insufficient for her support.

She has applied for restoration to the rolls, which was rejected October 6, 1891, on the ground that under the law she has no title to the pension on account of her remarriage.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out the words, in fourth and fifth lines, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert in lieu thereof "at the rate of $20 per month."

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, this is another of the bills to pension widows who have remarried. Many of the committee will remember the case of Susan D. Wright, which was under consideration a few evenings ago, and which I then opposed for the reason that she was not the widow of a soldier.

A MEMBER. But she was.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The same applies now to this case, and I oppose it for the same reason that I opposed that. Upon that evening I was met by the reading of an ancient law concerning the pensioning of Revolutionary widows, and the gentleman who read it, after he had completed the reading, announced, with something of a flourish of trumpets, that an apology was due from the gentleman from New Hampshire. I now ask the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS]. I felt somewhat chagrined that such a state of affairs should have existed and that I should have been totally ignorant of the matter. So I have taken occasion between that time and now to look up the status of the law in that regard, and I will read to the committee just exactly how it stands and what basis there was for the remark of the gentleman from New York. By an act of 1838 this became the statute:

If any person who served in the war of the Revolution in the manner specified in the preceding section has died, leaving a widow whose marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of his service—

There is a very important limitation. The marriage must have taken place before the end of his service, while he was in the Army—such widow shall be entitled to receive, during the time she may remain unmarried, the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband by virtue of the preceding section if living on June 7, 1832, and pension under this section shall not be withheld from any widow in consequence of her having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she may claim to be allowed a pension under this section: Provided, That she was a widow on July 4, 1838.

Now, let us note right here that that was passed fifty-four years after the close of the war. If like legislation shall take place fifty-four years after the close of the last war, it certainly will not be so objectionable as it would be now. But to go on a little further. By a joint resolution passed in 1846 we find the following:

If any person who served in the war of the Revolution in the manner specified in section 74 of this act has died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow whose marriage took place before the 1st day of January, 1794—

Only eleven years after—such widow shall be entitled to receive for and during her natural life, from and after the 4th day of March, 1848, the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband in virtue of section 74 of this act, if living on the 7th day of June, 1832: Provided—

And I ask the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] and of the committee to the proviso—

That in the event of the marriage of such widow such annuity or pension shall be discontinued.

So I will admit that for the period of eleven years that was the statute of the United States. But after an experience of eleven years upon this subject Congress deliberately repealed the only statute under which such widows were pensioned after their remarriage. But the gentleman, I presume, will call my attention to a section now standing in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to save him the trouble I will read it for him. This, I will say, is a resolution, No. 13, of July 1, 1848, transferred into the Revised Statutes as section 4743:

In all cases where a pension has been granted to any officer or soldier of the Revolution in his lifetime, the evidence upon which such pension was granted shall be conclusive of the service of such officer or soldier in the application of any widow, or woman who may have been the widow, of such officer or soldier, for a pension; and upon proof by her that she was married to any such officer or soldier, and that she is a widow, she shall thereupon be placed upon the pension rolls at the same rate that such officer or soldier received during his lifetime.

And that is the only existing statute now which in any way refers to the pensioning of remarried widows, and that does not authorize it at all, but simply says in connection with such cases as then had been filed and not adjudicated that the proof of the service of the soldier shall be conclusive as to their claims pending during the eleven years under which she was entitled.

Now, in all these cases, let it be noted that the widow was limited in the time of her marriage, and that only for eleven years was there a period under which such a pension could have been granted. That, too, was sixty-one years after any possible service in the war of the Revolution, and bringing that date down to service in the war of the rebellion, no such enactment would naturally take place until 1926; and I pledge the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] that I should be most happy to meet him here in 1926 to further consider this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy the time of the committee when it is seriously disposed to consider the questions before it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois who made the report is recognized.

Mr. WOOD. I yield a moment to the gentleman from New York, but desire to be recognized.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. My friend from New Hampshire, who has been looking over the ancient statutes which he is now reading to the House, might have occupied himself in matters which I think would be really of more value. We are engaged in the transaction of business which relates to the present. I quoted the statutes as they now exist in the Revised Statutes and in the volume of laws as published by the Pension Office. I desire to congratulate the gentleman from New Hampshire, who has by a long and slow process of reasoning, continuing two weeks, discovered the facts I stated to the House two weeks ago.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does he claim now that the law which he cited two weeks ago was one under which he thinks this woman could receive a pension after she had remarried.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I certainly do. I do not controvert the statutes of the United States.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It only refers to the matter of evidence.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, this discussion between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from New Hampshire is very interesting as an abstract question of law; but it arose on a pension claim that was reported by the committee at the last meeting, two weeks ago. That poor woman is dead, and her case will not trouble this House any more. Now let us get down to the case in hand, before she dies. I want to say this widow comes here just the same as the widow of any major-general or brigadier-general that is pensioned by special act of Congress. The law does not give Rachel Patton any pension, nor did it give a pension to the widow of General Cogswell.

Mr. MILES. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. The point I would like to inquire of the gentleman is just this: I understood him to say that she comes here just like any other widow; and if so, I would ask him for what reason he strikes out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and inserts in lieu thereof "at the rate of $20 per month"?

Mr. WOOD. I do that simply because it means precisely the same thing without so many words. "Subject to the limitations of the pension laws," will pension this woman at the rate of $20 per month; and it is best to have it understood, and plainly understood, so that this committee will know what it is having done, and know precisely how much pension they are voting to this woman.

Mr. MILES. I would like to ask the gentleman, because I think I was in the committee when this matter was up, if he does not know that under the general pension laws this woman would not stand like other widows?

Mr. WOOD. I understand under the general pension laws that this widow has no claim to a pension. I have said that already; nor have the widows of major or brigadier generals, and bills that have been introduced by my friend from Maryland and reported to this House also are in the same condition, that they have no standing under the pension laws.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman please explain under what provision of existing pension law, if this woman were pensioned as a widow, she would receive $20 a month?

Mr. WOOD. If she were pensionable under any existing law this bill would not be before this committee, and because she is not pensionable under any existing law this bill is here.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But the gentleman does not understand my question, which was: If she were pensionable under existing law what law would give her $20 a month rather than $12 or $8 a month?

Mr. WOOD. She was the widow of a captain of volunteers of infantry.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the amount of pension to a captain.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is all right.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman would wait a moment, I think I would come to that. I will not detain the committee but for a few moments. This woman was not married to the soldier since the war. She did not marry him to get his pension and help to spend it. She was his wife when the war broke out; she was his wife all through the war; she stayed at home and looked after his family.

I would be willing to pension her. She relieved the Government, by her remarriage, of paying $3,360 which otherwise it would have paid her. She remarried, but that marriage was unfortunate, and she has obtained a divorce on the ground of willful desertion and abandonment. A court of equity, which is a court of conscience, has restored to her her name, the honored name of her former husband, and I ask if the American Congress can not be as fair and just and generous as that court of law and give her back the pension which she lost by that unfortunate marriage. Her soldier husband was killed in battle, and I say this bill ought to pass. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the case we had under consideration when we last met in Friday evening session was that of a remarried widow whose husband had died. This is the case of a remarried widow who was divorced after living fourteen years with her second husband. I do not think it will be amiss for the House to hear the reasons that used to be submitted at these pension sessions in the last Congress when such bills were up for consideration, and therefore I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a report bearing upon this subject.

The report was read, as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to restore her to the pension roll the same as if she were still the widow of the soldier whose name she voluntarily surrendered years ago.

To pass this bill is to nullify for the benefit of this one individual the substantial limitation of the general laws that the pension of soldiers' widows who have remarried shall cease.

The objections to be urged against such bills as this are numerous. In the first place, it makes an exception of a case which is in nowise exceptional. There may be varying degrees of destitution in different cases, but it may be fairly stated that all cases of widows who have remarried and again become husbandless, by reason of death or divorce, present the same substantial conditions.

If any widow so situated should be restored to pension, all widows so situated should be restored, and this by general enactment and not by individual private bills, whereby those who may happen to have a friend to espouse their cause secure a benefit which the modest and the unknown never think of seeking. Special pension acts are justifiable only in cases which are essentially exceptional and should not be used to grant to one that which is denied to the many whose situation is precisely the same. But aside from this consideration, however, the soldier's widow who remarries voluntarily relinquishes her pension because she prefers to do so.

The Government can not become an insurer against an unfortunate termination of this second matrimonial venture either by divorce or death. To restore pension in case of divorce is to encourage remarried widows to seek divorces, and, in any event, it is to give them an ostensible claim upon the soldier's death and memory which they have long since renounced by preference.

Furthermore, it is not to be assumed that legislation of this character is in the line of justice or of honor to the soldiers themselves, or that it is necessarily desired or favored by the soldier classes. A contribution from the public Treasury to the support of the widow of the soldier, so long as she remains his widow, every soldier, perhaps, desires, and the common consent of the nation for thirty years has sanctioned this; but that each soldier looks forward to and desires that his services and his memory shall be the basis of a pension to his wife at some remote day, beyond an intervening period of matrimonial alliance with some other husband, is by no means self-evident or fairly to be presumed.

Mr. THOMAS. What is that document?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an extract from the RECORD, read in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERDMAN. It is a minority report made in a case similar to this.

A MEMBER. Who is the author?

Mr. ERDMAN. My name is prefixed to it.

The question being taken on the amendment proposed by the committee, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 8.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum, Mr. Chairman; and upon that I demand tellers.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, 13 gentlemen voted in the affirmative, not a sufficient number, and tellers were refused.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to make any factious objection to the pensioning of this widow, but just to call the attention of the gentlemen of this committee to-night, as I did a few nights ago, to the principle that is involved in the passage of this bill. On the last Friday night that we met here there was presented a bill, similar to this, for the benefit of Mrs. Susan Wright. It was presented by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] and on an appeal made to him by several members of this committee he was prevailed upon, from a sense of justice, from a sense of right, from a sense of principle, to agree to withdraw the bill, being satisfied that it was against principle and against law in theory and in practice.

Now, here is another bill proposing to pension another lady under almost identical circumstances, a case surrounded by almost the same conditions, the only difference being that, as stated by the gentleman who has charge of this bill, the courts have granted this lady a legal divorce from her second husband. That difference, however, does not alter the case in the least, because to grant this lady a pension would still be in direct violation of the pension laws of the United States, which laws are as liberal as laws can well be, so that if she is not entitled to a pension under the laws as they exist, it must be quite clear that she ought not to have a pension at all. I want to appeal to gentlemen on the other side of this House——

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a legal question. Does not the granting of the divorce place the woman in the same position that she was in before the marriage, and is not the presumption raised that no marriage existed at all?

Mr. TALBERT. No, sir; not by any means.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Does it not place her in the position she was in before the second marriage was contracted?

Mr. TALBERT. By no means. While I am not a lawyer nor the son of a lawyer, I am an honest man, and I can answer that question as a man of common sense. No. [Laughter.]

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that though I come from South Carolina I am not the man to stand up here to oppose the granting of a pension to any honest soldier or to the widow of an honest soldier who is justly entitled to it. I am willing to rise in my place here and advocate and vote for any such pension, and I have done so on former occasions. But at the same time I believe it to be my duty as a member of the American Congress to raise my voice against the violation of the laws of the nation in which I live. I believe it to be my duty to protest against what I regard as wrong in principle, wrong in practice, wrong in theory, and that is why I oppose the granting of this pension.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Does my friend oppose this bill because the lady is a divorced widow, and on the ground that South Carolina does not allow divorces, or is it because he thinks a woman who has been twice married needs no pension? [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. The laws of South Carolina do not enter into this question at all, sir. I am glad to say that we have no divorce law in South Carolina, and we expect never to have any such law. But that has nothing to do with the bill under consideration at this time.

And I want to appeal to the common sense of the Republicans, I want to appeal to your sense of justice, I want to appeal to your sense of right; I ask you to halt and consider before you take this step. I have been authoritatively informed that if you grant this pension, and grant pensions to others similarly situated, that it will not fall short of 100,000 in number, and in the preparation of the pension bill no arrangement has been made for that increase.

I do this, therefore, Mr. Chairman, from a sense of common justice and in defense of the right. I appeal to you and ask you gentlemen not to urge bills of this character; and I ask you if you are not willing to let it go over with an unfavorable report and not hold it over here as an obstacle to obstruct the way of other and meritorious claims that ought to be passed, and that ought to have, at all times, the right of way.

I hope you will do that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Oh, be quiet, and let your hair grow.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TALBERT. I yield to my friend with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask my friend from South Carolina if he considers it a violation of the pension laws for the same Congress that makes the pension law to make another law to put this specific case upon the roll?

Mr. TALBERT. It is not doing it. As a matter of course the makers of the law can violate the law, and they do it, and they are sometimes hung for it. [Laughter.] But that has nothing to do with the case, I will say to my distinguished, congenial friend, whom I like——

Mr. WILLIS. I want to know if in the judgment of the gentleman from South Carolina the granting of this pension would be in his opinion a violation of the pension law?

Mr. TALBERT. I do say that it would.

Mr. WILLIS. Can not the same power that made the law set it aside and make another?

Mr. TALBERT. Well, the Supreme Court is in that business. [Laughter.] They have enough of that kind of work to do now without our nullifying our own laws and despoiling our own nest. [Laughter.] As, for instance, the income-tax law. [Laughter and applause.]

I am not making any factious opposition. I am not making any technical objection to the bill. I am only suggesting to you that in the granting of pensions we should take, first, those cases which are really meritorious, and where the law should be applied. I do not wish to say anything that would injure any person's claim or do any harm to any honest applicant. I am willing to vote for all cases of that character that come along. But I do say to you that we should draw the line at such cases as this.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to say to my friend from South Carolina that when the Democratic party gets into power again of course the Supreme Court will have its hands full setting aside acts which they have passed. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Of course the Democratic party fills the hands of everybody, poor and all, alike. [Laughter.] That is the object of the Democratic party. But the Republican party, as soon as they get into power, take all out of the hands of the people that the Democratic party put into them. [Laughter and applause.] But that has got nothing to do with the case.

I only want to appeal to the common sense, to the justice of which gentlemen so much talk on this floor. Now, I know my friend has a great store of justice as well as regard for the old soldiers and their widows who are drawing pensions and those who do not draw pensions, and that he is as much opposed as anybody else to any invasion or innovation of their rights. But here is a direct violation of the rights of everybody. You are granting a pension to some one who is not entitled to it at all. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TALBERT. If our friends on the other side would only be patient a little while, they can get to a vote in time. I yield to my friend with pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman yields to me?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes. [Renewed cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, my friends, let us reason about this. [Laughter.] Let us reason about it like brothers. Let us talk over it a while, and let us reason like Christian gentlemen and brothers. How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. [Laughter.] Let us talk about it now quietly a little while, as I told you a while ago, and let your hair grow, although some of you have very little.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman from South Carolina yields to me and has indicated to me that he believes I am the possessor of a large sense of right and justice——

Mr. TALBERT. I know it; I do not believe it. [Laughter.] I know it.

Mr. WILLIS. I believe the gentleman yielded me the floor.

Mr. TALBERT. I did. Now go on. I was only going to say——

Mr. WILLIS. Now, if the gentleman is going to occupy the floor at the same time that he has yielded to me, why I think I will give it back to him. If he is like the Dutchman who had his treadmill wound up to go so long and would not stop until it was run down, then I will sit down. [Laughter.] But if he will yield to me I would like just to say a word more.

Mr. TALBERT. Well, I will withdraw the suggestion, if it is offensive to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. I do not believe that is justice or righteousness—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. I hope the gentleman will proceed; he is getting along very nicely. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. My friends around me suggest that our colloquy is injuring this case.

Mr. TALBERT. Oh, I hope not. If I thought so I would stop. I have no motive of that kind.

Mr. WILLIS. Then I think we had both better stop.

Mr. TALBERT. All I want to do is simply to get the attention of the committee to what I believe to be the rights of the case, and I want to know if we can not get together and reason on it. What are you in such a hurry to vote for? Are you afraid of your case? Or are you not willing to hear me for my cause?

Gentlemen, I mean to do right, and now I want to ask you, in justice to the old veterans, many of whom are not getting pensions who ought to have them, to let these claims that are unmeritorious and undeserving go by the board, and let us go along here and take up those whose claims are meritorious and who ought to be pensioned, and not take up the valuable time of this committee here in doing this kind of thing.

I do not feel disposed to take up any more of your time, and I believe you will do right.

I move now that this bill be laid aside with an unfavorable report, and I hope the motion will be carried.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. TALBERT. I made the motion that it be laid aside with an unfavorable report, and that takes precedence.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] has moved that this bill be laid aside with an unfavorable recommendation. We have heard from the gentleman from South Carolina before in this session of Congress. We have heard from the State of South Carolina every year, in every session of Congress, excepting the few years that South Carolina was not entitled to and did not have a Representative upon this floor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

South Carolina has produced more trouble to this country than any State in this Union, from the days of John C. Calhoun, when President Jackson threatened to hang him for treasonable acts and utterances, until to-day, when the gentleman from South Carolina on this floor one day preaches and justifies treason and the next day opposes the payment of pensions to disabled Union soldiers and their widows. A South Carolina Congressman talking treason and opposing the pensions to Union soldiers in the House and a South Carolina Senator talking anarchy and communism in the Senate of the United States is a spectacle that in these latter days stands without a parallel.

I have no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to discuss sectional questions at the Friday night sessions, which should be exclusively devoted to the consideration of private pension bills. I am willing and ready to vote for every private pension bill that shall be by the Committee on Pensions favorably reported to this House, but I do not propose to be dictated to as to how I shall vote by Representatives from South Carolina, a State, sir, which has never since the war had an honestly elected Democratic Representative in either the House of Representatives or Senate of the United States. If South Carolina had sunk into the sea in 1860 this country would have been saved thousands of lives and billions of dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. I do not desire to reply to the gentleman, because he has not touched the subject at all. To his claptrap about South Carolina and her Representatives since 1872, I return the salutation of silent, scornful contempt. I always come directly to the subject, but now I want to say again that South Carolina can take care of herself and has always done it. But, as we have now heard from the gentleman from Canada, let us have a vote. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, what do I understand the question to be?

The CHAIRMAN. That this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PICKLER. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina to move that it be laid aside with an unfavorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. This motion takes precedence of the other motion. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Division.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 92 and the noes are none, and accordingly the bill is laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. MILES. No quorum.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point comes too late. The decision had been announced before the gentleman rose.

Mr. MILES. My friend made the point, and I made it, too. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The decision had been announced before the gentleman rose.

Mr. MILES. I move that the committee rise. Now, I just want to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a point of order. The Chair had ordered the Clerk to read the next bill, and the Clerk was taken off his feet by the gentleman's motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] is in order. The point of order of the gentleman from South Dakota is not well taken. The question is, Shall the committee now rise?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ERDMAN) there were—ayes 1, noes 94.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. MILES was rejected.

PETER B. PALMENTEER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2797) granting a pension to Peter B. Palmenteer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter B. Palmenteer, late a private in Company D, Seventh Michigan Cavalry, and to grant him a pension at the rate of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act, the same to be in lieu of any other claim for pension under existing law.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported an amendment striking out the words, "from and after the passage of this act, the same to be in lieu of any other claim for pension under existing law."

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I ask that the report be read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2797) granting a pension to Peter B. Palmenteer, having carefully examined the same, together with the evidence, respectfully submit the following report:

On September 10, 1862, the claimant enlisted in Company D, Seventh Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, and served from that date until December 15, 1865, when mustered out and honorably discharged. On September 24, 1879, a claim was filed by him under the general law, and on June 2, 1885, a pension was granted at the rate of $2 per month for injury to spine, from December 16, 1865, to February 20, 1884, when the disability ceased. On August 26, 1891, a claim for restoration was rejected on the ground of no pensionable degree of disability.

On November 27, 1891, the claimant filed under the act of June 27, 1890, and the medical examination, which was made in 1892, shows applicant's condition as follows: "Four-eighteenths for injury to right arm; nothing for injury to spine, chest, and abdomen, and old age; two-eighteenths for rheumatism; and is disabled from pensionable and other causes." On July 21, 1893, however, this claim was rejected on the ground of no ratable degree of disability under said act.

It seems that in 1892, when the medical examination was made, the claimant was clearly entitled to at least $6 per month, and since that time his rheumatism and other infirmities have increased to such an extent as to warrant the amount fixed by the bill.

In view of all the facts, your committee respectfully recommend that the bill be amended by striking out, in line 8, all after the word "month," and that as so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill asks the House to overrule a decision of the Pension Office, and it seems to me that the gentleman in charge of the bill should, in justice to the claimant, make a full statement of the facts of the case. The report does not show that the bill has been considered with the judicial fairness which the Committee on Invalid Pensions should always show in considering any bill, especially in the paragraph before the last, which says:

It seems that in 1892, when the medical examination was made, the claimant was clearly entitled to at least $6 per month, and since that time his rheumatism and other infirmities have increased to such an extent as to warrant the amount fixed by the bill.

Why does it seem so? I trust the gentleman will make an explanation.

Mr. MAHON. Before debate is had on this bill I would like paragraph 6, Rule XIV, read. I do not want to make any objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. No member shall speak more than once to the same question without leave of the House, unless he be the mover, proposer, or introducer of the matter pending, in which case he shall be permitted to speak in reply, but not until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. May I inquire for whose benefit my colleague had that rule read?

Mr. LACEY. I want to make an inquiry of the committee, because this brings up a question that very many members have before them. I have written perhaps forty letters during the last month to soldiers who have asked me to introduce bills to increase their pensions, and to allow them pensions, where the question of ratable disability was involved; in other words, an appeal from the Pension Office to the House of Representatives. If this bill is that kind of a bill, and the report is somewhat vague, we ought to know it, so we can furnish the committee with abundance of work, as there are thousands of these cases. It may be that there is more than is indicated in this report that makes this an exception. If not, and it is merely a case where the Pension Office does not give a man as much as he thinks he ought to have, I would like to have the gentleman explain the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I would say to the gentleman from Iowa that this bill was reported before the general bill which covers this class of cases, was reported. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported a committee bill which covers such cases as this and gives the rating as first exercised by Commissioner Raum.

Mr. LACEY. Then this is practically a repeal of the Bennett case?

Mr. PICKLER. This practically disposes of cases such as the Bennett case.

Mr. LACEY. Then every case under the special act of 1890 would be on the same footing?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know about that. There is an eighteen-dollar rating for total disability; that is, a dollar for every eighteenth. Now, the report in this case shows that they found four-eighteenths of disability in one cause and two-eighteenths in another, which would make six-eighteenths. According to the present holdings of the Pension Office, unless it shall be shown that the claimant has six-eighteenths in one disability he can not get any pension at all. A case was given to me yesterday in which the Pension Office found forty three-eighteenths, and because the soldier did not have six-eighteenths of any one disability they rejected his claim. Now, it seems to the committee that is out of all reason, and this man was clearly entitled to $6 per month, as he was found to have four-eighteenths and two-eighteenths. From the circumstances surrounding the case the committee were of the opinion that he was equitably entitled to $12 a month.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by myself and I should be pleased to give the committee any information they desire in regard to the condition of this man. It will appear from the report that he enlisted in 1862 and served upward of three years, making a very honorable record; that after leaving the Army he applied for a pension and was given a rating of $2 a month for disability incurred in the service. That was increased from time to time until 1878, when it was claimed on an examination that the disability of injury to the spine had ceased to exist.

Now, it appears that many times an injury of that kind does not appear upon the surface, and it is so considered in this case. Information came to me from conversation with the man himself, and also from his comrades and neighbors, which shows that he has been unable to do a day's work during the last three years. They sent a petition to me requesting me to introduce a bill and make the statement that this man is upward of 60 years of age; that he had been totally dependent upon the little pension he had; that to-day he was helpless and would have to be assisted by the public unless the pension were given to him.

The rating that was given in 1892 would entitle him to $6 a month, as shown by the medical examination; but since that date the man has grown worse. He is getting older, is totally disabled, and appeals to this Congress to take into consideration his honorable record and his condition and grant him the mere pittance of $12 a month for his services.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say if the gentleman from Canada will stop his fog horn and his idle vaporing long enongh, and if he will get back into his seat and quit talking about hanging people, for some people I know of are not worth hanging, I want to say I think this pension ought to be granted. [Laughter and applause.] Here is a brave old Union soldier [laughter], against whom nothing can be brought, and while his claims were denied at the Pension Office originally, it has been shown to the committee and by this report that at the time he would have been entitled to $6 a month, and since that time his rheumatism and other ailments have increased to such an extent as to make him under the law entitled to a still higher rate of pension.

It appeals to my sense of justice, and, as I said in opposing the other pension, I do not think it is right to give it; but here is one before us in which I think it is, and I am honest enough to say that this old soldier, against whom nothing can be brought, ought to have this pension, and I am willing to give it to him. [Applause.]

I am sorry that the gentleman from Canada has left so early, for I wanted to say to him that I hope he will quit talking about hanging a man that has been dead for seventy-five years. If he must hang people, let him try to hang living folks, and then he will show a little more bravery; and I want to say right here, gentlemen, that you do not find the old soldiers who met each other in the red blaze of battle fighting the war over again now. That is generally done by those who in time of peace are invincible, but in time of war were invisible. [Laughter.] I hope this bill will pass. I give it my hearty indorsement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS C. SCHILLING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2224) granting an increase of pension to Lewis C. Schilling.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHARLES A. FOSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4220) granting a pension to Charles A. Foster, late acting assistant surgeon, United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Charles A. Foster, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose this bill, but I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to a general bill upon this subject (No. 3131) which I had the honor to introduce in the House, and I hope that before other private bills of this character are reported favorably that general bill will receive the consideration of the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. In reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, I will say that in the general bill already reported we have provided for these cases.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that bill, to come in at the end.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the pension herein granted shall be paid to Charles A. Foster, and that no part of it shall be retained by any authority to reimburse the Government for any pension heretofore paid.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this is an attempt to pension by a special bill one of a large class, and it is therefore open to the objections which lie against all of that kind of special legislation. I understand also that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] has reported a general bill in which this class of claimants, and probably teamsters, and I do not know but camp followers also, are all provided for. However, when it is proposed to pension any of these as a class, we can consider that question; but I deem it unfair and unjust to a large number of people similarly situated to allow a special bill of this character to go through, especially in view of the fact that it is proposed to give this man arrearages of pension indirectly, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, under the old law there was no question but what contract surgeons came under the law, and they are receiving pensions now. Under the act of 1890, as first construed, pensions were granted to this class of army surgeons and assistant surgeons, and this man enjoyed a pension from 1890 to 1895, when he and some others were stricken from the rolls, it being held—and I think, perhaps, according to the strict letter, although I do not believe it was the intent of the law—that this class of surgeons did not come under the provisions of the act of 1890. This man is 80 years of age, and I do not believe that he can wait long enough on this earth for us to pass a general law on this subject, so I think we ought to pass this bill now.

The amendment of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN E. EVANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3432) for the relief of John E. Evans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of John E. Evans, late sergeant, United States Marine Corps, on board United States sloop of war Jamestown, on the pension roll at $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3432) granting increase of pension to John E. Evans, having carefully considered the same, respectfully submit the following report:

The claimant enlisted in the United States Marine Corps July 14, 1862, and was honorably discharged therefrom. He again enlisted January 17, 1871, and was discharged May 20, 1872. He is now pensioned under the general laws at $12 for rheumatism, resulting disease of heart, chronic diarrhea, and resulting disease of rectum.

While in the first service he has a record of treatment for "diarrhea," vertigo, "epileptic attack," bilious colic, and bronchitis. While in the second service he has a record for treatment for "abscess," "phthisis pulmonalis, with cough and night sweats;" "severe spasm," "attack of epileptiform kind, also hæmoptysis."

Claimant has been examined four times within the last five years. The examination of June 7, 1895, shows that "this man can do no effective manual labor," and another, had on August 20, 1895, shows incapacity "in a degree equivalent to loss of a hand or foot for purposes of manual labor."

The evidence on file in the Pension Bureau discloses the fact that the claimant is afflicted with nervous affection to a degree which totally incapacitates him, and the further fact that it originated in the service. It appears, however, that he is unable to obtain a pension commensurate with his disability, because he does not understand the nature of his disease, and is misled by the belief that he is affected with heart trouble.

Your committee, therefore, in view of all the facts, respectfully report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I feel called upon in this case to oppose with all the power I have the granting of a pension of $30 a month. I want clearly to define my position. This man is entitled to a pension under the law of 1890 of $12 a month, which he is now receiving, and there is no law in existence, nor any conceivable stretching of any law, that could give him any greater pension than that. Now, I want to say to my Republican friends——

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman understand that this man is getting $12 a month under the old law?

Mr. LOUD. No; under the new law.

Mr. PICKLER. No; he is getting it under the old law.

Mr. LOUD. Well, your report does not so state.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the House, that I do not think the Commitee on Invalid Pensions are treating the House with proper courtesy in the reports which they present here——

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman will allow me, I refer him to the sixth line of the report, where this statement is made:

He is now pensioned under the general laws at $12 for rheumatism, resulting disease of heart, chronic diarrhea, and resulting disease of rectum.

Mr. LOUD. That is all right.

Mr. PICKLER. That is what I said.

Mr. LOUD. I admit that he is being pensioned under the "general law," but I claim it is under the law of 1890.

Mr. PICKLER. No; it is under the old law.

Mr. LOUD. Well, I assume that it is under the law of 1890.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to controvert the report.

Mr. LOUD. I want to say to the gentleman that it appears by the very report in this case that this man did not contract these diseases during his service in the Army or in the Navy. The principal diseases which are recited in the report were treated during this man's first service, yet notwithstanding that fact he was well enough in 1872 to enlist in the Marine Corps, in which the examination is the most searching that is required in any branch of the service.

Mr. Chairman, these are facts, and they can not be denied. This case stands substantially on the same plane as the case of Kate Pittman. I know nothing of the papers on file in the Pension Office, but it appears to me exactly in the same light as that case, as far as the report of the committee shows anything about it.

Now, I wish to say to my Republican friends, that if you are going to pension every man who is disabled to-day in this country it ought to be done by a general law. But on behalf of the old soldiers of the country I appeal to you to make no exceptions in individual cases of this kind. If it is right to pension a man at $30 or $50 per month, then it is right to pension every man who is disabled at the present time, under similar circumstances, at the same rate, although it may not be the result of his service during the war. I have, you have, and no doubt every member present has, twenty-five or more men in his district, of his personal acquaintance perhaps, who stand on precisely the same footing as this one, men who are blind or paralyzed who have been trying day by day and year by year ever since the close of the war to connect their present disability with the service, and it is impossible for them to do so. And I say to you whenever a man becomes disabled or blind twenty-five or thirty years after the close of the war that it is a very large stretch of the imagination to connect that disability with the service.

I repeat, I feel about this case as I did in the case of Kate Pittman. I do not propose to raise the point of order of no quorum in the Committee of the Whole on the consideration of this case; but in reference to this, and all cases of a similar character, I will require you to furnish a quorum in the House, because I do not think such bills ought to pass under any other circumstances.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, very well, we will do that.

Mr. LOUD. All right. I reserve to myself the right to demand a quorum; and I am perfectly willing to stand on that record before the soldiers of this country. I am satisfied that they want, and all that they want, is justice and equity for all, and not justice and equity, as you consider it in the committee, for the few.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the House, and to the gentleman from California who has just taken his seat, that I have seen this old soldier myself, and I am very sorry that I could not file him as an exhibit with my report in this case.

Mr. LOUD. I do not care anything about his present condition.

Mr. MILES. I will come to the other points directly.

If you will read the report carefully, I think you will see that it sets out the fact that in the opinion of the man who made the report—and I can consult no other man's judgment than my own, and no other man's conscience than my own in the preparation of these reports—after reading the whole record in the case, and examining the evidence in the Pension Department, I came to the conclusion that this old soldier has to-day the same epilepsy which he had in the war; and I want to say to the gentleman from California that if he knows anything of the disease called epilepsy, he knows that it is a peculiar and an insidious disease, and how hard it is for expert physicians even to discover it. It is entirely possible, therefore, that when this man reenlisted in the service of the Marine Corps the epilepsy was not discernible even by an expert.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman if the testimony of the physician or the medical expert brought to bear in pension cases is not just as good an opinion as his or mine?

Mr. MILES. That is very true, but the gentleman knows well that the medical expert, if a man mistakes his disease in his application, never comes to his rescue to tell him what it is, and the Department will not do it. He must file his application, alleging his disease, or they will not aid him and tell him what disease he is suffering from. The gentleman knows very well how difficult it is for a man to understand exactly what his own disease is.

The War Department records, however, allege that this man had epilepsy during the service, and was treated for that, and if my friend should see him I have no doubt that he would conclude that he had it to-day. But the man does not know it himself; and the gentleman knows full well that people afflicted with this disease are always averse to acknowledging it.

Mr. LOUD. And even the committee could not convince him that he had it?

Mr. MILES. Well, I never mentioned it to him myself. It is twice mentioned in the war records, and it is also mentioned in the report. The record of the case shows that he was suffering with this disease. I have reported to the House that I believed the disease from which he is suffering had its origin in the service. So believing, I reported that I thought it a meritorious case. I believe it to be a worthy case, and one that the House should act upon and pass.

I wish to say that I never introduced the bill myself. I know nothing of the man, and knew nothing of him until I saw him in the room of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The bill was introduced by Mr. PICKLER, the gentleman from South Dakota, and he may know something more of it than I do. As far as I know of the case, however, I am satisfied of its merits, and this I gather from my own examination of the record in the office.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, all I know about this is that I have known this old soldier for about a year here in the District of Columbia. I do not know what employment he has, or whether he has any; but, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] has well said, this man is to-day a physical wreck. He appeared before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. He was treated for this epilepsy in both services. He was treated for it during the first service, and in the second service he was treated for the same disease. He is totally incapacitated from performing manual labor. Thirty dollars is what the law allows for that form of disability, and we are standing exactly upon the pension laws.

The only trouble about this case is that this old man says all the time that he has heart disease, and he has alleged heart disease in his application. The Pension Office finds that that is not what is the matter with him, but it is epilepsy, and that is all the trouble there is about getting his claim through. Had he alleged epilepsy there is no question but what he would have had his $30 a month. I believe if there is a just bill on the Calendar this is one of them. This is exactly the amount that is allowed by law to every soldier who proves he is totally incapacitated from performing manual labor. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to allow this case to go over for one week.

Mr. MILES. I think the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] understands the law that if this soldier is totally disabled he is entitled to what this bill gives him.

Mr. LOUD. If he is totally disabled as to the result of his service, yes. I understand the law. It makes a great deal of difference whose ox is gored, I find in cases here.

Mr. MILES. This is no ox of mine.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman advocates this case because he reported it. The gentleman advocated the pensioning of a woman at $72 a month, which bill, I am free to confess, would not have been passed without a quorum if I had been on the floor of the House. I think the chairman would do better to let this case go over. In view of the fact that you can not convince this applicant himself that he is suffering from this disease, how can you expect to convince the Pension Department?

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, the gentleman from California has got his knife out, and is going——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no; I have not got any knife out. I am here in the interest of justice and equity.

Mr. PICKLER. You declared publicly that you were going to raise the question of no quorum in cases of which you did not approve.

Mr. MILES. I had about taken the floor for the purpose of extending the courtesy to the gentleman from California which he asked, but he has been so discourteous in his language that I can not get the consent of my mind to do so. I thought his request was reasonable. I have no interest whatever in this case. I did not introduce the bill. I have applied to the consideration of this case my conscience and my best judgment. The gentleman insinuates the contrary, and to no man making such an insinuation will I, without an apology, ever extend a courtesy.

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understood him to state that this applicant was first said to be suffering from heart disease, but that it turned out upon examination by the authorities not to be heart disease, but epilepsy. I am not a doctor, but I want to ask the gentleman, who may be a doctor, if epilepsy is not an indirect effect of some heart trouble?

Mr. PICKLER. I give it up. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JULIA A. HILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A. Hill, widow of Charles W. Hill, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill, having carefully examined the same, together with the evidence submitted, adopt the accompanying Senate report (No. 5) as their own, and respectfully report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill passed the Senate in its present form December 21, 1895.

[Senate Report No. 5, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 141) granting a pension to Julia A. Hill, having examined the same, beg leave to report as follows:

This bill passed the Senate in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, but was not considered by the House. The reports already made cover all the facts in the case.

Claimant is the widow of Col. Charles W. Hill, late of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Soldier was mustered into service December 25, 1863, and remained in service until July 13, 1865, the close of the war. He died in Toledo, Ohio, November 24, 1881, of brain disease, alleged to have been the result of sunstroke received while in the military service. Prior to his service in the United States Army he was commissioned by the governor of Ohio as brigadier-general and was placed in command of the State troops in West Virginia, where he rendered important service. The widow applied for pension, which was finally rejected, chiefly on the ground of unsoundness prior to enlistment.

To arrive at a clear understanding of this case it will be necessary to review the testimony at length, which, it is proper to say, is somewhat conflicting.

When the widow's claim was filed the Pension Bureau called upon the Adjutant-General's Office for information as to the military service of the soldier, and received this reply:

"Charles W. Hill was mustered into the service of the United States as colonel of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, to date December 25, 1863, to serve three years or during the war. On the muster roll of F. and S. of that regiment for the months of January and February, 1864, he is reported present, and so borne to August 31, 1864. September and October, 1864, absent commanding United States forces at Johnsons Island and Sandusky, Ohio. Subsequent rolls to June 30, 1865, present. He was mustered out with regiment July 13, 1865.

"Regimental returns: October, 1864, on leave of absence. March, 1865, absent with leave. All other returns (February, 1865, alone missing), present. Organization books are incomplete and furnish no information in this claim. He was granted leave of absence for fifteen days October 25, 1864, on surgeon's certificate, which is not on file, and nature of disability not of record. Again for fourteen days November 12, 1864, on private business. Again for one day January 15, 1865, private business. For ten days March 31, 1865, on surgeon's certificate, of which the following is a copy:

"'Col. Charles W. Hill, of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, having applied for a certificate on which to ground an application for leave of absence, I do hereby certify that I have carefully examined this officer and find that he is suffering with chronic ulcerations of the mouth and general nervous prostration, caused by impaired digestion and anæmia, and in consequence thereof he is in my opinion unfit for duty. I further declare my belief that he will not be able to resume his duties in a less period than fifteen days.

"'Dated at Johnsons Island, Ohio, this 22d day of March, 1865.

"'H. EVERMAN,

"'Surgeon, U. S. Volunteers, Chief Medical Officer.'

"And finally for five days, June 19, 1865, on private business.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"M. BARBER,

"Assistant Adjutant-General.

"By WM. ARMSTRONG."

It will be interesting to briefly review the facts as presented in the above statement. In the first place, it appears that soldier served continuously from December, 1863, until October, 1864, before he applied for sick leave, and it further appears that the records were so carelessly kept as not to show the cause of disability. Again, in March, 1865, sixteen months after enlistment, he secured sick leave, the certificate showing that he had ulcers of the mouth and general nervous prostration, caused by impaired digestion, the surgeon giving it as his opinion that the soldier would not be able for duty in a less time than fifteen days—from which it would seem that the disability could not have been of long standing.

The widow's application for pension was based on the ground that soldier suffered sunstroke in the Army, and all the medical evidence goes to show that he died from softening of the brain; but the Department rejected the claim on the ground that the brain disease was not due to ulceration of the mouth and general nervous prostration, and that it was not otherwise shown to be due to military service; and it was also claimed that he had trouble with his head prior to enlistment.

So far as the record shows no one ever claimed that the ulceration of mouth and nervous prostration had anything to do with the death cause. The claim set up was that the soldier sustained sunstroke while in the service, which ended in fatal brain disease. On this point the widow was not able to produce conclusive proof, yet a mass of circumstantial evidence is on file which ought to be given great weight, and it is possible that if the army records had been carefully kept it would appear that soldier's first sick leave was in consequence of sunstroke, to which he frequently alluded after discharge as the cause of his ill health.

Six different special examiners had charge of the case, four of whom expressed an opinion that the case was meritorious, and the other two reported against it. The adverse reports were made on the ground that the soldier was not sound at the time of enlistment. It is evident that prejudiced testimony was given on this point by children of soldier by a former wife, between whom and claimant unfriendliness existed. Claimant furnished a large number of certificates, medical and otherwise, showing that soldier was in excellent health at the time he entered the service, which is strongly corroborated by the fact that, after serving three months, in 1861 he entered the service of the State as adjutant-general, where he remained until December, 1863, when he took charge of a regiment, in which capacity he served for almost one year before asking for sick leave. Had he been an invalid when he enlisted, it is hardly to be supposed that he could have undergone the fatigues and exposure of that length of time without medical aid.

The following affidavits have an important bearing on the cause of death:

STATE OF OHIO, Lucas County, ss:

On the 15th day of November, A. D. 1883, personally appeared before me the undersigned, Dr. James L. Chase, who, being by me duly sworn, says that he now is, and has been for over forty years, a practicing physician, and was well and intimately acquainted with Charles W. Hill, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. That affiant was the attending physician at the death of Charles W. Hill. That said Hill died at Toledo, Ohio, on the 24th day of November, 1881, of paralysis, superinduced and brought about by softening of the brain, and that said softening of the brain was caused by a sunstroke which said Hill received in the military service. Affiant well knew said Hill before he entered the Army, and he was then a sound and healthy man, free from any brain difficulty. * * * Affiant was intimate with said Hill from the time he returned from the service till the day of his death, and affiant knows that said Hill never recovered from said sunstroke, and always suffered therefrom, as he verily believes.

JAMES L. CHASE, M. D.

Above affidavit was given at Toledo, Ohio, and sworn to before Andrew Farquharson, notary public.

The following medical certificate is likewise of interest:

NASHUA, N. H., November 16, 1886.

This certifies that in July, 1878, I was called to see Gen. Charles W. Hill, late colonel of the One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers. From appearances disclosed on examination great distress in head and lack of power both of body and mind. I regarded the disease as progressive breaking down of the substance of the brain, and as a very probable consequence of sunstroke; and from the history of the case, the long duration of the symptoms, and the unsuccessful result obtained from treatment, I should consider there was no doubt but that he contracted the disease while in the service.

S. G. DEARBORN, M. D.,
Late Surgeon New Hampshire Volunteers.

(Sworn to.)

Dr. Woodbridge, of Youngstown, Ohio, an army surgeon, gives a similar opinion, and testified that he frequently heard Colonel Hill while in the service, complain of trouble with his head.

The only adverse medical testimony in the case is found in an affidavit by Dr. D. B. Sturges, of Pittsburg, Pa., who swears that he first knew Colonel Hill in December, 1864, when he was suffering from indigestion and ulceration of the mucous membrane of the mouth. Dr. Sturges gave it as his opinion that the ulcers were due to a scrofulous diathesis, which condition probably existed before enlistment, and it is evident that in deciding the case the Pension Bureau attached great weight to this affidavit, notwithstanding Dr. Sturges did not know the soldier before enlistment, while Dr. Chase knew him before enlistment, attended him in his final illness, and came to an entirely different conclusion.

On the question of soundness at date of enlistment there are scores of affidavits on file from persons who knew Colonel Hill intimately, and who testify that he was entirely sound when he entered the military service. These affidavits are given by bank officials, by merchants, by lawyers, judges, and other reputable citizens. On that point the testimony is absolutely overwhelming; but notwithstanding that, the question of prior unsoundness seems to have cut quite a figure in the final determination of the case.

The claimant in this case is at present a resident of Milford, N. H., engaged in teaching, from which she must soon retire, as she is in poor health. She has nothing except what she earns. The equities in the case seem to be wholly on her side, and although there is conflicting testimony, and very likely the evidence was not sufficiently conclusive to warrant the Pension Bureau in favorably considering the claim, your committee are of the opinion that the case is a meritorious one, and therefore report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, how much does this bill carry?

Mr. PICKLER. This is a Senate bill. This lady is the widow of a colonel. By the passage of this bill she will get $30 a month.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MICHAEL M'KENNA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3596) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Michael McKenna.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing upon the records of the War Department against the name of Michael McKenna, alias David Dunton, late of Company F, First United States Dragoons, and to grant him an honorable discharge.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended an amendment, to add to the bill the following:

To date July 31, 1848: Provided, That this shall not entitle such soldier to any pay or emoluments, except pension, which he would not otherwise be allowed.

The report (by Mr. BISHOP) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3596) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Michael McKenna, alias David Dunton, would respectfully report the same back to the House, and recommend that the bill be amended by adding:

"To date July 31, 1848: Provided, This act shall not entitle such soldier to any pay or emoluments, except pension, which he would not otherwise be allowed."

And that the bill when so amended do pass.

This soldier ran away from home at the age of 11 years, enlisted under an assumed name as a bugler, and served through the Mexican war. When peace was declared and his regiment returned to the States, his parents found out where he was and took him home without the formality of a discharge. He enlisted again in the same troop in 1853, served five years, and was honorably discharged.

Owing to his enlistment at such a tender age, his faithful service through the Mexican war, his subsequent enlistment and honorable discharge, your committee are of the opinion this act of clemency should be extended.

The Adjutant-General's report is as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.
"Washington, D. C., February 16, 1895.

"Respectfully returned to Hon. Jos. H. Outhwaite, chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

"It appears from the records of this office that David Dunton was enlisted on the 9th day of December, 1846, at Saltillo, Mexico and was assigned to Troop F, First Regiment of United States Dragoons. Muster roll of troop for July and August, 1848, reports him 'Deserted July 31, 1848, at camp at Carrollton race course, near New Orleans, La.,' a private. Records show him to be a deserter at large from this enlistment.

"He enlisted again June 18, 1853, at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., in band, First United States Dragoons, under name of Michael McKenna, in violation of the twenty-second (now fiftieth) article of war, being a deserter at large. Discharged June 18, 1858, at Fort Tejon, Cal., by expiration of service, a private.

"H. C. CORBIN,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

Application for removal of charge of desertion.

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA, County of Pima, ss:

On this 2d day of December, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the county of Pima, in the Territory of Arizona, David Dunton, alias Michael McKenna, now a resident of Tucson, county of Pima, Ariz., who, being duly sworn, declares that he is the identical David Dunton, alias Michael McKenna, who was a bugler in Company F, in the First Regiment of the United States Dragoons; that he was enlisted in said company and regiment during the latter part of 1846 at Camargo, Mexico, by Capt. Philip Kearney, mustered into service during the bombardment in 1847 at Vera Cruz, Mexico; that he served faithfully until on or about the 31st day of July, 1848, when, without any intention of deserting, he left the regiment under the following circumstances: His father obtained permission from the commanding officer to take him home to see the family, with the understanding that he was to be returned to camp the next morning. Upon reporting next morning, found the regiment had embarked on a steamer up the Mississippi River, and, not knowing where to report, he returned home.

Subsequently, in June, 1853, he again enlisted in the First United States Dragoons and was assigned to the band.

(The applicant is unable to give the exact date of his enlistment and mustering into service, but knows that he joined the company in camp below Camargo, soon after they arrived from the East, and was sworn in just before the bombardment of Vera Cruz.)

This declaration is made for the purpose of securing a removal of the charge of desertion, and he hereby appoints, with full power of substitution and revocation, M. V. Tierney, of Washington, D. C., his attorney to present this application, and to receive and receipt for the discharge that may be issued thereon, and to do any and all acts necessary to effect the purpose of his said appointment.

His post-office address is Tucson, Ariz.

MICHAEL MCKENNA.

ADAMS SANDERS.
T. G. RUSK.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that here is another case which is not meritorious. It is the case of a deserter asking to have the charge of desertion removed, and it does seem to me that there are other cases much more meritorious, and that this case ought to be laid aside at least, and let other cases be considered.

Mr. BOWERS. Will my friend allow me to make a statement?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. BOWERS. This boy was 11 years of age when he enlisted, and he served through the war—he was a bugler—so that when he went home after the war he would have been only about 14 years old. Then he reenlisted in the same troop, served five years, and was honorably discharged.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. TALBERT. I will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER. This was a boy 11 years of age. His father lived near New Orleans. The boy ran away and enlisted under the name of David Dunton, so as not to be caught and taken home. When they got down into Mexico an officer in charge of one of the troops of dragoons took him from the company in which he was and had him taught to be bugler of his troop. He served through the war, came up near New Orleans, and was there with the regiment on a boat. His father found him, and asked if he could not go home with him for a while. The lieutenant said, "I do not know; we may have to leave at any time." The father took this little tot, about 13 years of age, with him, and when they came back the boat was gone. He shortly afterwards enlisted in the same regiment and battalion as an older boy, got into the band, and stayed there five years. Having gotten older, and I am sorry to say a little poorer, he comes here and says, "I served all through the war, and when I asked for a pension they say it could not be granted because they say I deserted. I did not."

Mr. TALBERT. This case is all right. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report them to the House with various recommendations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole two weeks ago.

MARTHA BROOKS.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2800) granting a pension to Martha Brooks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "twelve."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ERDMAN. I would like the gentleman who has charge of that bill to state what it was. I do not recollect it now.

Mr. BRODERICK. That bill was recommended for passage two weeks ago, at the last evening session we had for the consideration of bills of this character. It was fully explained then, and recommended for passage without division. It is the case of an old lady, the gentleman will remember, 83 years of age, who is a dependent mother. There is no question about the evidence, and there was no question in the committee. The report was unanimous, and there was no question here when the bill was recommended for passage.

Mr. ERDMAN. How much does the bill carry?

Mr. BRODERICK. Twelve dollars. I introduced it for $20 and the committee amended it, making the rate $12.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN D. WRIGHT.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw that bill from further consideration of the House. The morning after it passed the Committee of the Whole I received notice that Mrs. Wright was dead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw the bill from the consideration of the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and without objection, the bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

KATE A. PITMAN.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 995) granting a pension to Kate A. Pitman.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendments will be voted on in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

RACHEL PATTON.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 1185) granting a pension to Rachel Patton.

The amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole was reported.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what that bill is. I do not recall it.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It passed to-night.

Mr. ERDMAN. If that is the remarried-widow bill, I shall require a quorum to vote upon it.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, so far as this amendment is concerned there is no reason why it should be adopted, except that it was put in there that there should not be any misunderstanding in regard to it.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendment, and that the bill lie over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MILES. I object, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to have to object, but I am opposed on principle to granting pensions to these remarried widows, and I must interpose all objections known to parliamentary practice when it is attempted to pass bills of this character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maryland object to the bill being laid aside?

Mr. MILES. I have no objection to its being laid aside, but I do object to its retaining its place. I want it to go to the foot of the Calendar.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question being taken on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 6.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

Mr. PICKLER. Will not the gentleman consent to let this bill go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, so that we may proceed with the other bills? Will he not withdraw his point of no quorum and let us dispose of bills to which there is no objection?

Mr. ERDMAN. I will say to the gentleman that his appeal comes too late.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How many members constitute a quorum in the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and seventy-nine.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, who raised the point of no quorum?

Mr. ERDMAN. I made the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) adjourned until 12 o'clock Saturday.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Civil Service Commissioners, replying to the House resolution of February 4, in relation to the efficiency of employees—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriations for defraying the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CORLISS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which were referred bills of the following titles, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by reports; and said bills and reports were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union:

The bill (H. R. 1414) to establish the Mahon River light station, Delaware River, on a new site. (Report No. 369.)

The bill (H. R. 5363) making an appropriation for a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin. (Report No. 370.)

The bill (H. R. 3552) providing for sundry lights, etc., in Lakes Huron and Superior. (Report No. 371.)

The bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog signal at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey. (Report No. 372.)

R. 3822) to abolish the office of Solicitor of Internal Revenue, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 375); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FISCHER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5382) to authorize the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Memphis Railroad Company to extend its line of railroad into the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 376); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5293) for a light vessel off Fire Island, New York, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 378); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CURTIS of New York, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 379); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred a bill of the House (H. R. 3621) reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 6120) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service, accompanied by a report (No. 381); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3278) to amend section 1 of an act approved December 21, 1893, entitled "An act to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 382); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. WASHINGTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 1601) to amend the military record of John S. Evans. (Report No. 366.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 15, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GEN. ALEXANDER WEBB.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the bill to place Gen. Alexander Webb on the retired list of the Regular Army.

There was no objection.

DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

The bill and the amendments were read.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that bill be now considered and that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. QUIGG, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

YANKTON RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to know what is the status of this bill.

The SPEAKER. It is a House bill which has been amended by the Senate and been sent back to the House, and, as the Chair understands, it is a bill which would not go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McMILLIN. That being so, is it a proper subject for consideration in this hour?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what amount of land is affected by it.

Mr. LACEY. I can not give the gentleman the exact number of acres, but the Senate amendments include some additional reservations in the State of South Dakota, where the situation is substantially the same as in the one covered by the House bill. The original proposition was this: These settlers entered upon the land too late to plant a crop that year. Under existing laws they could have an extension of a year if they had planted a crop and it had failed; but in this case the crop did not fail; it simply failed to get planted. This bill gives them a year's leave of absence, the same as if the crop had been planted and had failed, but requires them to live an additional year upon the land in order to acquire their homesteads. In other words, they get no credit for this leave of absence. The Senate has made some amendments to the bill, and I have asked that those amendments be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

LEASE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona, with an amendment of the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate was read at length.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1591) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to the lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the mineral-land laws of the United States be, and are hereby, extended so as to apply to all lands embraced within the Colville Indian Reservation, namely: Beginning at a point on the eastern boundary line of the Colville Indian Reservation where the township line between townships 34 and 35 north, of range 37 east, of the Willamette meridian if extended west would intersect the same, said point being in the middle of the channel of the Columbia River, and running thence west parallel with the forty-ninth parallel of latitude to the western boundary line of said Colville Indian Reservation in the Okanogan River, thence north following the said western boundary line to the said forty-ninth parallel of latitude, thence east along the said forty-ninth parallel of latitude to the northeast corner of the said Colville Indian Reservation, thence south following the eastern boundary of said reservation to the place of beginning: Provided, That the land used and occupied for school purposes at what is known as Tonasket School, on Bonapart Creek, and the site of the sawmill, gristmill, and other mill property on said reservation, is hereby reserved from the operation of this act, unless other lands are selected in lieu thereof as provided in section 6 of the act which became a law, without the approval of the President, July 1, 1892, entitled "An act to provide for the opening of a part of the Colville Reservation in the State of Washington, and for other purposes."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, passed the Senate, and was reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House. There is no objection to it from any quarter, and it is recommended by the Interior Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object—unanimous consent, I believe, not having been given yet for the consideration of the bill—I would like to ask for the reading of the report, one of them, either the House or Senate report.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have adopted the Senate report and incorporated it in the House report from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It shows the recommendation of the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who also recommend an amendment, which was adopted by the Senate and is a part of the bill. This bill has been recommended by all of the Government officials.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman states on whose recommendation it was made, but gives no information concerning the bill. That is what I am trying to get at. I am willing to take the statement of the gentleman in place of the report, but it seems to me, in a matter so comprehensive as this, we ought at least to have some understanding as to what we are doing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the reservation to which this bill relates is in the State of Washington. There is legislation pending now having for its purpose the opening of the reservation. That has been going on for some time. There are well-known mineral lands in the reservation, and this provides that the mineral lands may be segregated from the great body of the lands——

Mr. SAYERS. What reservation does this refer to?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Colville Reservation.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman if the purpose of segregating the lands—the mineral lands—is for the purpose of ascertaining their value?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Oh, no; it is only that these mineral lands, which are recognized as quite valuable, shall be placed under the well-known mineral-land laws of the United States. These lands are in the north half of the reservation.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is this land that has been bought from the Indians by the United States?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; the reservation is being opened and the lands are to be allotted. It was an Executive-order reservation, and not a result of legislation.

It seems to me that it ought to be satisfactory to the House when all the officials of the Department, the Secretary of the Interior and all, have agreed to it and recommend it.

Mr. BOATNER. I think we will do little harm when we accept the recommendation of the Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POWER OF EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to inquire as to the condition of the law on the subject of the right of the executive officers of the Government, in the several Departments thereof, to refuse to enforce, execute, or comply with the provisions of any act of the Congress of the United States on the ground of its alleged unconstitutionality or for other reasons, and to report to the House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe the right to object has not yet been waived in this case. I am willing that the gentleman from New York shall state the purpose of this resolution and the effect of it.

Mr. RAY. Perhaps I should say a word by way of explanation of the resolution.

It grows out of the recent refusal of the Comptroller of the United States Treasury to execute a law passed by Congress appropriating money for the payment of the sugar bounty. The Comptroller raised the question, when the matter came to him, that the appropriation was unconstitutional, and he therefore refused to certify and pay the money. It resulted in the question being sent to the Court of Claims under an act of Congress claimed to be applicable.

The question was very thoroughly argued before the Comptroller as to whether or not he had jurisdiction or a right to raise the constitutional question, and whether, under an act of Congress, he had power to take the action that he did take. Very able arguments were made on both sides of the question by gentlemen learned in the law; and it must be conceded, on all hands, that the question is one not entirely free from doubt.

January 3, 1896, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] introduced into this House a resolution (H. Res. 84). That resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and after careful consideration that committee agreed upon and reported back a substitute, House resolution No. 125, accompanied by Report No. 105.

The original resolution recited certain matters or transactions connected with the Treasury Department of the United States growing out of and connected with the nonpayment of certain sugar bounties earned under the tariff act of October 1, 1890, and the payment of which was provided for by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," and which act made an appropriation of $5,238,289 for the payment of such bounties.

Certain claims for such bounties having been presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and by him allowed, same were certified to the Auditor of the Treasury Department.

The first claim so allowed was that of the Oxnard Beet Sugar Company, and amounted to $11,782.50. The Auditor proposed to allow such claim and certify the amount thereof for payment from the appropriation of March 2, 1895. Acting under the provisions of section 8 of the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat. L., 208), the Auditor certified this decision to the Comptroller as an original construction of the statute making the appropriation.

It will be noted that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives had, by appropriating the money for the payment of these claims, asserted the constitutionality of the tariff act of October 1, 1890; that the President of the United States had assumed and asserted its constitutionality by approving the act of March 2, 1895; that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had assumed and asserted the constitutionality of both acts by allowing and certifying the claim, and that the Auditor of the Treasury Department had reiterated and acquiesced in these holdings by passing and proposing to pass this claim. But when the matter came to the Comptroller of the Treasury Department for final certification and payment he refused, or at least suspended, payment, and called upon the Oxnard Beet Sugar Company and other claimants under the same to show why the Comptroller should not hold that the tariff act of October 1, 1890, was unconstitutional, and consequently the act of March 2, 1895, appropriating money to pay the bounties earned under that law, unconstitutional also.

After several hearings the Comptroller adhered to the opinion that the appropriation was unconstitutional, and acting under the provisions of section 1063, Revised Statutes of the United States, he returned the papers in the case to the Auditor, who transmitted same to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he transmitted same to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Section 1063, Revised Statutes, provides as follows:

Whenever any claim is made against any Executive Department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds $3,000, or where the decision will affect a class of cases or furnish a precedent for the future action of any Executive Department in the adjustment of a class of cases, without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, the head of such Department may cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon the certificate of any Auditor or Comptroller of the Treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount, or class described in this section to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents, and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said court for trial and adjudication.

On the one hand, it is most earnestly and vehemently asserted that section 1063 confers no such power as has been claimed and exercised by the Comptroller, and that he has usurped power, defied the authority of the Congress of the United States, and violated his plain duty as an executive officer of the Government.

On the other hand, it is claimed that the law referred to plainly covers the case and confers the power exercised: that it is a wise provision, and that the power ought to rest in the Treasury Department to refuse to pay out money appropriated by Congress when the act is unconstitutional or void for any reason. It is asserted that an unconstitutional act is not a law; that it binds no one and protects no one who executes it, and that when grave doubts exist those charged with the execution of a law prima facie valid necessarily have the power to suspend its execution and ought to be protected by law in the exercise of such power, whether it turns out that the law is constitutional or otherwise.

It is plain that the laws of the United States ought to be faithfully executed. The Constitution so provides. It is also plain that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land and must be obeyed; also that every law duly passed is prima facie valid and constitutional.

It is common knowledge, however, that the legislatures of the several States and the Congress of the United States occasionally pass unconstitutional acts. The Supreme Court of the United States, upon which rests the constitutional duty of determining such questions when properly before it, has so held. It follows that the right to challenge the constitutionality of every law ought to rest somewhere, and where can that right rest except with those charged with the execution of the law or those whose duty it is to obey it?

But if this right exists, if it ought to exist, it should not be lightly or frivolously exercised.

In some of the States, notably the State of New York, provision has been made by law whereby such a question can be raised by any taxpayer.

It may be wise that the laws of the United States be so amended that any citizen may bring suit to determine such a question; that the heads of Departments only shall be permitted to raise the question; that no head of Department or any officer thereof shall raise such a question unless the Attorney-General of the United States shall have first pronounced against the legality of the law in question.

It may be safely asserted that the condition of the law on this subject is unsatisfactory; that the law is uncertain; that the questions involved are of great importance, and that some action ought to be taken that will fix the powers and duties of all executive officers.

The original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana was quite severe upon the Comptroller of the Treasury. It seemed to express the views of that gentleman, who recited that the refusal of the Comptroller to certify the claims for payment was a refusal to perform a ministerial duty simply, and one imposed upon him by law, and that it constituted a nullification of a law of Congress and deprived citizens of their rights; that the assertion by the Comptroller of the right or power to act as he did in the premises was inconsistent with the dignity of Congress and in direct contempt of its authority, and the resolution proposed an inquiry, first, as to whether the power existed and, second, in case it should be determined that no such power existed, to report action that should vindicate the authority of the Congress of the United States.

The substitute reported by the committee contains no recitations whatever, but refers generally to the action of the Comptroller, and authorizes the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the condition of the law on this subject and report to the House by bill or otherwise.

The general rule is that if an executive officer executes an unconstitutional law and litigation follows in which it is determined that the law is unconstitutional the officer is not protected in what he has done. It has been claimed that if the Comptroller should obey the act of March 2, 1895, and the appropriation made by that act should be declared unconstitutional he would be personally liable to the United States for the money paid out under it. It is asserted that there is no difference in principle between this case and one where a sheriff or marshal takes the property of a private citizen under an unconstitutional law against the will of the owner. It is asserted that an unconstitutional act is not a law in any sense and affords no protection whatever to any officer, high or low, who executes it.

I for one do not assent to the proposition that any officer connected with the Treasury Department would incur personal liability should he execute an act of Congress duly approved or passed over the President's veto by paying out money appropriated and directed to be paid thereby.

I do not assent to the proposition that section 1063 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizes the Comptroller of the Treasury to refuse to execute a law upon the ground that it is unconstitutional. I do not think that section applies to or was intended to cover such a case.

But inasmuch as the question has been raised, the Committee on the Judiciary has thought it proper that the law on this subject be examined into, and that a report be made to the House either by way of suggesting legislation or otherwise. Those who will take the trouble to study the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury, written by him when he took action in the sugar-bounty cases, will see that he contends for a doctrine that if established would enable him to suspend the payment of every account and claim upon which he has power to pass upon the ground that the law of Congress was unconstitutional and send the matter to the Court of Claims for adjudication in the court. If such a power exists an overzealous Comptroller or one exceedingly sensitive on constitutional questions may at any time seriously embarrass the transaction of the business of this Government.

It would seem highly proper that the Comptroller of the Treasury shall construe all acts of Congress when construction is necessary, in order that he may disburse the moneys of the Government in strict accordance with the law, but it seems at first glance exceedingly improper that he should be empowered to suspend the operation of laws prima facie valid upon the ground that he is a better expounder of the Constitution than the Congress itself, and in some cases than the Congress and President of the United States acting in harmony.

On the other hand, no person, whether occupying an official position or not, desires that the Constitution be violated or that an unconstitutional law be enforced. It would seem more proper that the question be raised by some person other than the one charged with the execution of the law.

It would be a strange situation should a judge refuse to pass sentence upon a convicted criminal on the ground that the law authorizing sentence was, in his opinion, unconstitutional. Still, judges have the right to interpret as well as enforce the law. Judges have the power to adjudicate upon the constitutionality of all laws, and still this power presupposes that the question is brought before the court in some of the methods known to the law.

If the Congress of the United States, having created the office of Comptroller and charged that officer with the duty of enforcing its laws, has at the same time clothed him with the power to question their validity and refuse to enforce them, we have a situation that is novel, to say the least. If such is the condition, then Congress has created a censor of all its acts appropriating money, and has empowered the President of the United States to appoint that censor, by and with the advice of the Senate alone.

I feel justified in asserting that Congress never intended to confer such authority upon the Comptroller of the Treasury or any other executive officer. If it has done it, it is high time that the law be amended, and that if such power is to rest anywhere it be conferred upon the head of a Department alone, and that the power of such head of Department shall be restricted in such a manner that the business of the Government may not be interfered with.

If an executive officer in one of the Departments may refuse to execute a law of Congress upon the ground of its unconstitutionality, it is difficult to see why the heads of Departments may not refuse to execute laws upon the same ground, and why the President of the United States may not refuse to enforce any law upon the same ground.

It will not do to say that Congress is supreme; that its acts can not or should not be questioned. The humblest citizen when called upon to act under or obey a law prima facie valid may deny its constitutionality and test its validity; but this is a personal right, and rests on the ground that he has a right to protection in his person and property and that the Constitution is his shield. When Congress passes a bill and the President approves it, and when Congress provides executive officers to enforce such law, it is hardly presumable that it intends to clothe such officers with power to question the validity of the act.

Still, if these officers may not raise the question, who shall? If money is appropriated for a purpose not warranted by the Constitution, and the disbursing officers discover the fact, shall they execute the law and consummate an illegal and an unauthorized act of Congress?

These questions, with many others, suggest themselves and demonstrate the wisdom of a careful investigation of this subject. The committee has taken no position on the question. The resolution asserts nothing, denies nothing, but simply directs investigation, and authorizes a report that may be useful to the House. The question, so far as it relates to the President of the United States, is not a new one.

In 1868 Andrew Johnson, then President of the United States, issued an order under date of February 21 removing Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary of War and appointing Gen. Lorenzo Thomas Secretary of War ad interim, in plain violation and disregard of the act of Congress entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil officers," passed March 2, 1867.

This action was made the basis of one of the articles of impeachment preferred against the President. The President undertook to justify his action on the ground that the said act was unconstitutional; at least that he believed it to be unconstitutional; acted in good faith and in obedience to his oath of office to support the Constitution and execute the laws; that an unconstitutional act of Congress is not a law in any sense, and that all executive officers, from the highest to the lowest, had the right to refuse obedience to an unconstitutional act of Congress.

The managers on the part of the House of Representatives, on the trial of the President, contended that this plea constituted no answer; that it is the duty of every executive officer to obey and faithfully execute the laws as he finds them written upon the statute books, and can not raise constitutional questions in this way.

The question was very fully and ably argued on both sides.

The argument of Hon. William M. Evarts, later a Senator of the United States, and at one time Secretary of State of the United States, will be found at pages 717 and 719 of the report of that trial, and he cites many cases showing that the right to raise the constitutional question has been exercised by executive officers whose duties are ministerial many, many times. This power or asserted right has been exercised by executive officers in the State and city of New York many times, and I am not aware that the right has been questioned. Still I have not found a case arising in New York where the officer has been brought to account. His right to raise the question by refusing to execute the law seems to have been acquiesced in.

In the case of the President impeachment failed. The doctrine contended for was condemned, however, by a vote of 35 to 19.

I have offered these suggestions for the mere purpose of demonstrating the propriety of adopting this resolution. A careful examination of the condition of the law on this subject will suggest necessary changes and lead to a discussion of the subject that will probably result in great good.

The Committee on the Judiciary is not seeking this labor. We have enough on hand to occupy our time and sharpen our wits, but the question being one of general interest and one forced upon our attention, we are willing to undertake an investigation on the lines suggested by the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. The language at the end of the resolution, "with authority to report by bill or otherwise," would not make the matter privileged when it came in, would it? My impression is that there would have to be inserted the words "to report at any time, by bill or otherwise," in order to make it privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Maine is right, and that this would not be a question of privilege. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state, sir—not rising for the purpose of interposing any factious objection to what may have been done by the committee—that I am not in accord with the ulterior purpose sought to be attained by this resolution. I believe that an executive officer executes any unconstitutional law at his peril. Therefore, there must be somewhere resting upon him the duty of inquiring as to whether or not a particular act is unconstitutional, when that matter has been brought directly to his attention. But if the House desires merely to instruct the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the law upon this subject, I will interpose no objection so far as that is concerned; but I desire to state, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, that I am not in accord, as I have said, with the ulterior purpose of this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FORT SMITH AND WESTERN COAL RAILROAD COMPANY, INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4153) to grant the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It provides that the Fort Smith and Western Coal Railroad Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Arkansas, be, and the same is hereby, vested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, beginning at a point to be selected by said company on the western boundary line of the State of Arkansas, at or near the city of Fort Smith, Sebastian County, and running thence by the most practicable route through that part of the Indian Territory occupied by and known as the Choctaw Nation, in a southwesterly direction through the counties of Scullyville, Sans Bois, Gaines, and Tobucksy, to a point on the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway, in said Choctaw Nation, between McAlester and South Canadian, with a switch from a point on said line to form a connection with the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway at a point on that railroad, to be located between Cedars Station and the Backbone Tunnel.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the following amendments:

In section 2, line 11, strike out "two" and insert "one"; also in said line strike out "three" and insert "two." And in line 18 of said section strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "fifty."

In section 3, line 20, strike out "thirty" and insert "ninety." After the word "States," in line 21, insert the word "district."

In line 22 of said section strike out the following words: "At Muscogee, Indian Territory," and insert the following: "For the central district of the Indian Territory, sitting at the place nearest and most convenient to the property sought to be condemned."

Strike out all of section 8.

In section 9, in line 13, strike out the word "five" and insert "three."

Add, at the end of section 10, the following amendment:

"Provided further, That the entire line of said road shall be surveyed and located, and said location approved by the Secretary of the Interior before the work of construction shall commence."

Mr. LITTLE. I wish to offer an amendment which was omitted in the report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add, at the end of section 1, the following words:

"And with the right to build in the line of said railroad a bridge across the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall be first approved by the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER. Is this amendment approved of by the committee?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITNEY. I rise for the purpose of asking a question for information. I should like to know if there is enough land remaining in the Indian Territory to furnish a right of way for this road? [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. There is an abundance of land in the Territory, and all the land taken will be paid for.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TUG MYSTIC.

Mr. STEPHENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1137) for the relief of certain parties, sufferers by the burning of the tug Mystic while in Government employ.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $523.45, to reimburse certain parties hereinafter named for certain property lost by them by the burning of the tug Mystic while employed by the United States in connection with the resurvey of St. Marys River, Michigan, said parties being at the time of said burning in the employ of the United States, and said loss having occurred through no fault or negligence on their part. The persons to whom said money shall be paid and the amount to be paid them, respectively, are as follows, namely: Glen E. Balch, assistant engineer, $261.90; John C. Turner, carpenter, $55.60; Rebecca Day, cook, $94; P. C. Bye, laborer, $56.75; Thomas J. Bye, carpenter, $6.15; Robert R. Cook, laborer, $19.90; Edward McMorris, laborer, $29.15; total, $523.45.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. STEPHENSON. It is in accordance with the recommendation of General Poe, and it only carries $500.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. WOODARD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1137) for the relief of certain parties, sufferers by the burning of the tug Mystic while in Government employ, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report the same, with the recommendation that it pass.

The letter from the Secretary of War, Executive Document No. 129, Fifty-third Congress, second session, fully sets forth the facts, and your committee adopt the same and make it a part of this report.

Mr. SAYERS. I think it is customary where losses are sustained as the result of injuries inflicted by Government vessels.

Mr. McMILLIN. But this is not a Government vessel.

Mr. SAYERS. It was employed by the Government.

Mr. STEPHENSON. This is all right; it is only $500.

Mr. McMILLIN. The Government is not an insurance agent for those vessels that it employs. I would like it to go over, so as to have an opportunity to read it. I see the report is very long.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

EXAMINATION AND CLASSIFICATION OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2819) to provide for the examination and classification of certain lands in the State of California.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to ask whether this bill has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands; it received the approval of the committee, as it has received the approval of the officers of the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is there any communication to that effect?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not know. I am asking for the consideration of the bill on the report of the Committee on Public Lands. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this is merely an extension to the State of California of the provisions of the Idaho and Montana act, as it is called, which was passed at the last session of Congress, for the purpose of allowing the segregation and classification of mineral lands in the State of California. It is a bill that was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands; all the people in our State are in favor of it; the delegation, Republicans and Democrats alike, are unanimously in favor of it, and it is not opposed by anybody, but will work great good, and I hope no one will object.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and would like to hear an explanation of the bill. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this point: Here you are passing a bill, or proposing to pass one, which recites old acts of Congress making grants of large areas of the public domain to various railroad corporations named in the bill. Now you provide that the mineral lands embraced in the grants shall be subject to certain things. Now, might it not be held that this bill ratifies these grants as to all the lands that are mineral?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, Mr. Speaker, it does not provide anything of that kind.

Mr. BOWERS. This is the same as the Idaho and Montana bill.

Mr. TERRY. I do not know anything about the Idaho and Montana bill, but this is a very serious question.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will state to the gentleman that this is simply a provision for the classification of the lands by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States for the purpose of deciding which is mineral lands and which is not. Lands that are mineral do not go to the railroad company, but those that are mineral do go to the settlers. It does not affect the title of the land in any degree. It does not affect anything, except to allow the people a quick and expeditious manner of settling the question as to whether the land is mineral land or not.

Mr. TERRY. I understand that, but that is not my point.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It does not confirm the title to the railroad grant. It does not affect the title.

Mr. McRAE. If the gentleman will permit me, I would state that the bill states distinctly—

That nothing in this act shall be taken or construed as recognizing or confirming any grant of land or the right to any grant of land in—

And then it goes on and mentions the railroads.

Mr. TERRY. Is that stated in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. There was so much confusion I could not hear.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask that the report be read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TALBERT. I rise to a point of order. We can not hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to ask the House to come to order.

The report was read at length.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman who wants to pass this bill will produce a letter from the Secretary of the Interior saying that the bill is all right, I shall not object; but it seems to me that it is a rather dangerous thing to legislate in this way respecting this land, which belongs either to these railroad companies or to the United States.

Mr. HARTMAN. Let me just speak to the gentleman a moment. I want to say that this bill is an exact duplicate of the bill which the Fifty-third Congress passed for the examination and classification of the mineral lands in the States of Montana and Idaho. That bill is operating to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And as a Representative from one of those States I want to say that in conversation with the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office both of those gentlemen expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with the operation of that bill in those respective States.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has this bill ever been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. LACEY. It has not been so submitted.

Mr. McMILLIN. Nor to the Commissioner of the General Land Office? Has the opinion of either one of them been obtained upon it?

Mr. HARTMAN. Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is an exact duplicate of a bill which did meet the approval originally of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office in so far as it applied to Montana and Idaho. The same principle is involved in this bill, and it has operated very advantageously in the States to which it is applied.

I have in my hand the report from two of the districts in Montana, wherein it is shown that in one of the districts the total cost per acre of the examination and classification has been only 2.3 cents.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman wholly mistakes my interrogatory. What I asked was whether or not this bill had been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HARTMAN. I am informed by the gentleman from California that it has not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why has it not been submitted to the Secretary?

Mr. HARTMAN. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that question. I am informed by members of the Public Lands Committee that inasmuch as the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office had favored a similar bill applicable to Montana and Idaho, and inasmuch as this bill was simply for the purpose of extending the benefits of the provisions of that bill to the State of California, it was taken for granted that this also would meet the approval of the Secretary and of the Commissioner. Furthermore, the bill had worked so advantageously in Montana and Idaho that it was supposed it would be expected to work advantageously in California. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] was chairman of the Public Lands Committee in the last Congress, and he recommended the bill for Idaho and Montana. He is a member of the Public Lands Committee in this Congress, and he favors the passage of this bill, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will not object, but will let a bill of this meritorious character, which everybody interested is satisfied with, be considered and passed. The miners want it; the railroad company is satisfied with it; the people of California, irrespective of party, want it. It will do a great deal of good in California, and it will not do anybody any harm. The only objection I have heard to the bill is simply that it has not been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior; but I am informed by my colleague from California [Mr. BOWERS], who is a member of the Public Lands Committee, that the reason it was not submitted was that it was supposed that the Secretary and the Commissioner would approve it because they had approved a similar bill for Montana and Idaho. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] is present and understands this matter and can explain it, and I trust he will do so.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, a bill like this was introduced by Mr. Caminetti, of California, at the last session of Congress. I had to leave before the end of the session and can not state why it did not become a law; but this bill, I understand, is, with one exception, identical in terms with the one reported from the committee in the last Congress as to Idaho and Montana.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is identical.

Mr. McRAE. I have stated that it is literally a copy of the Montana-Idaho bill. I do not think the Department has been asked by the committee to consider it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from California whether there are not different conditions involved in this bill from those that were involved in the other bill; whether there are not rights of the Government and of the railroad companies involved here that were not involved in the bill applicable to Montana and Idaho.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, sir. This bill especially guards all the rights of the Government.

Mr. BOWERS. The fact is that the mineral lands that belong to the United States are now being taken by the railroads, and we want to save them for the United States and for the people. That is the whole matter.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If that be true, why did you not get the indorsement of the Secretary of the Interior for the bill?

Mr. BOWERS. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office had approved the bill for Idaho and Montana, and this is a similar bill extending the provisions to California, and I hope no one will object.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, in making the grants to these railroads originally the mineral lands were reserved to the Government. There was for a long time a contention on the part of the railroads that they were entitled to all of the lands not known to be mineral at the time of the definite route of location, and it was not until last year or the year before last that the Supreme Court passed upon the question. It has been held that the railroads take no lands known to be mineral at the time of the patent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say this to the gentleman in charge of this measure: I knew so little about the bill that I hardly felt at liberty to interpose an objection, but this is the first time I have ever known a bill of this magnitude to go through the House without the opinion of the Department within whose jurisdiction the matter comes being called for. It seems to me peculiar that that was not done in this case, and we have had no sufficient explanation as to why it was not done. Thus much I wanted to say; thus much I think it is right to say; and I believe now that it would be much better to let this bill go over until Monday morning. In the meantime the Secretary could be consulted. It is not difficult to get to him. If this is a good bill, as is claimed, there will be no difficulty in getting the approval of the Secretary. If it is not a good bill the House ought to know it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Tennessee and other gentlemen for not objecting, and I want to say simply that whenever the California delegation and people can agree upon anything, that ought to be the best evidence on earth and in heaven that it is a good measure, for we are the most factional fighters in the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. I will ask the gentleman whether he knows what the Secretary of the Interior thinks about this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am informed that he is in favor of it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Who said that?

A MEMBER. Mr. BOWERS.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman [Mr. BOWERS] does not claim that he submitted this bill to the Secretary at all.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will answer that by saying that in view of the fact that an exact duplicate of this bill applying to Montana and Idaho had been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in view of the fact that they had approved that bill and were satisfied with the working of it, I suppose the gentleman in charge of this bill did not see fit to further burden the Secretary and the Commissioner with the subject.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman's statement bears out what I have said, that they never asked the Department anything about it.

Mr. HARTMAN. Exactly. That is perfectly true.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the bill is in such condition that its consideration can not be obstructed by a single objection, and in view of that fact I will ask the gentleman whether he is not willing to let it go over until Monday morning, in order that in the meantime the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior can be obtained? Let the bill go over with the understanding that it will come up at Monday's session.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I do not know enough about the rules to know whether if this bill now goes over until Monday it will lose its place.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill go over until Monday, to come up for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PORT OF DELIVERY, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6) constituting Syracuse, N. Y., a port of delivery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Syracuse, in the State of New York, be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the seventh section of the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said port; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at said port, who shall receive a salary, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I think we ought to have the report read. I see this creates a new office.

The report (by Mr. SHERMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6) providing that Syracuse, N. Y., be constituted a port of delivery, beg leave to report back to the House with an amendment and with a favorable recommendation.

Insert after the word "by," at the end of line 5, the words "the seventh section of."

This amendment is suggested by the Treasury Department, and as thus amended the Department approves the bill.

The part of said section 7 to which this amendment is intended to apply reads:

"That the privileges of transportation herein conferred shall not extend to any place at which there are not the necessary officers for the appraisement of merchandise and the collection of duties."

Syracuse is a city of over 100,000 inhabitants. The passage of this bill is asked by her municipal government and all her large importing houses, of which there are many. The imports of the city last year, so far as reported to the manufacturers' exchange, were $1,662,866, and estimating those not reported, the amount would exceed $2,000,000. The custodian of the United States public building writes that "ample room can be provided on the second floor of the building" to accommodate the proper officials if this bill is enacted.

The bill merely meets the needs of largely increasing commerce at Syracuse.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was considered, the amendment recommended by the committee was adopted, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. POOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JOHN C. CUTTER.

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 83) for the relief of John C. Cutter, first lieutenant, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order accepting the resignation of First Lieut. John C. Cutter, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, on January 2, 1864, "for the good of the service," and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of said date: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to allow the said Cutter any pay, bounty, or other allowances to which he would not have been entitled under the terms of his original discharge.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I would like to hear the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. PARKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 83) entitled "A bill for the relief of John C. Cutter, late first lieutenant Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry," beg leave to report:

This is a bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to revoke the order accepting Lieutenant Cutter's resignation on January 2, 1864 "for the good of the service," and to issue to him an honorable discharge from that date, with the usual proviso against pay, bounty, or other allowance.

Lieutenant Cutter was regimental quartermaster under Colonel DRAPER, who now introduces this bill. In retreat, November, 1863, from Lenoir, east Tennessee, he burned the officers' baggage and some other effects. His affidavit states that this was for want of wagons and by order of General Ferrero, to prevent its falling into the enemy's hands. The Colonel reported that it was from neglect to give personal attention to the transportation, preferred charges of neglect of duty, and withdrew them on receiving his resignation. Colonel DRAPER continues:

"I found it would not go through by a mere ordinary indorsement, and I indorsed it 'for the good of the service,' and he was then discharged.

"As there was nothing in Lieutenant Cutter's record of a dishonorable character, he having been a good soldier, and having failed only in this matter of carelessness, I think it no more than fair that this stigma should be removed from his name."

The committee concur in this view, even if Lieutenant Cutter was careless, which he denies. He could not, and did not, anticipate that his resignation would have been accepted dishonorably.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts object to an amendment at the end of the bill, in addition to the relinquishment of any pay, bounty, or allowances named there, to include also the words "or pension"? This party would be pensionable under this bill.

Mr. DRAPER. I have no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment proposed by Mr. McMILLIN was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed,

On motion of Mr. DRAPER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 54) authorizing the National Dredging Company to proceed with the work of dredging the channel of Mobile Harbor, under the direction of the Secretary of War—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Joint resolution (S. R. 65) to print the annual report of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service—to the Committee on Printing.

A bill (S. 824) to require patents to be issued to land actually settled under the act entitled "An act to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of the unsettled part of the peninsula of Florida," approved August 4, 1842—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1320) to confirm the title to certain lands in William Morgan and Harrison Moore, and to require the issue of patents therefor—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1693) for the rebuilding or repair of the public wharf at Sitka, Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HARBOR OF MANITOWOC, WIS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to submit a favorable report on a resolution of inquiry and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read at length.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report was read.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The amendment recommended by the committee simply makes the House resolution a joint resolution.

I think there is no opposition to the resolution. The War Department has the information ready; it will involve no expense, and can be returned to the House in a very short time.

Mr. LOUD. Let me ask the gentleman if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would not have that power—to call for any information in the hands of the Secretary of War—without this resolution?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We would not have presented this resolution if we had the power.

Mr. LOUD. The question in my mind is whether this resolution does not warrant the Secretary of War in going beyond the power that you give him in the direction of surveys. If not, it seems to me that the committee could get all the information without coming into the House. The language is a little indefinite.

Of course, I understand that they could not appropriate the money until they had the survey; but this is calling substantially for a survey not warranted by the law adopted in the last river and harbor bill. I can not help thinking that the committee would have abundant power to get the information sought here without coming to Congress at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is mistaken, I think. The committee discussed the matter very fully. This calls simply for the return to the House by the Secretary of War of such information as he has now in his possession. This is needed for the use of the House and the committee in the consideration of this matter. Of course the committee do not want him to make a new survey, but simply to furnish the information, such as the resolution calls for; and I would say to the House and to the gentleman from California that the hearing on the matter is to come up before the committee on Monday next. A delegation from that city is present, the information is already in the possession of the War Department, and this information can be prepared and returned by the Department by Monday next, in time for the hearing.

Mr. LOUD. I am satisfied that the power is already in the hands of the committee to get all the information of this kind that is available. The only objection is that it seems we are making a special case before Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to make an additional survey. I simply call attention to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors conferred with the Secretary of War, or rather with the Chief of Engineers, concerning this matter; and it is at the suggestion of the chairman that the committee this morning passed the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to make the change in this resolution from a simple House resolution to a joint resolution?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the purpose of the amendment that has been offered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which makes the resolution a joint resolution.

The amendment was adopted.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the title of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that no title has been appended to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask leave to withdraw the resolution, and I will prepare the title.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is withdrawn.

VESSELS IN ST. MARYS RIVER.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4779) relating to the anchorage and movement of vessels in St. Marys River.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to adopt and prescribe suitable rules and regulations governing the movements and anchorage of vessels and rafts in St. Marys River, from Point Iroquois, on Lake Superior, to Point Detour, on Lake Huron, and for the purpose of enforcing the observance of such regulations the said Secretary is hereby authorized to detail one or more revenue cutters for duty on said river.

SEC. 2. That all officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service who are directed to enforce the regulations prescribed by the above rules are hereby empowered and directed, in case of necessity, or when a proper notice has been disregarded, to use the force at their command to remove from channels or stop any vessel found violating the prescribed rules.

SEC. 3. That in the event of the violation of any such regulations or rules of the Secretary of the Treasury by the owners, master, or person in charge of such vessel, such owners, master, or person in charge shall be liable to a penalty of $200, and the vessel, its tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, at any time used or employed in violation of such regulations, shall be forfeited to the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may remit said fine or release said vessel on such terms as he may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to hear the report read, or some explanation.

Mr. BENNETT. The purpose of the bill is simply to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make regulations to provide against accidents in the St. Marys River, through which all commerce to and from Lake Superior must pass, comprising thousands of vessels, steam and sail.

Mr. LOUD. Why do not the present regulations cover it?

Mr. BENNETT. Because of the peculiar circumstances existing there. There is at present no law governing the movement of vessels on and through the St. Marys River beyond the steering and sailing rules for the navigation of inland waters. The channel is only 300 feet wide, and in some places there is barely space for large ships to pass. Its enactment has become necessary, as rules may properly be made under the provisions of the bill which involve no expense in enforcing them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE ST. FRANCIS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3962) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake St. Francis, in the State of Arkansas.

The bill was read. It provides that the St. Francis Bridge and Turnpike Company is hereby authorized to construct, operate, and maintain a drawbridge across Lake St. Francis, at or near Lake City, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with such plans as the Secretary of War may decide to be necessary in the interest of navigation; and the draw shall be constructed in accordance with such plans as may be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I now ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PATTERSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, having considered House bill 3962, recommend that the bill be amended as follows:

In line 15, section 1, insert the words "the said company" before the word "may."

In line 21, section 2, insert the words "from sunset to sunrise" after the word "bridge," and in line 23 of same section strike out the words "when any vessel shall signal to pass."

As amended, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MAHANY objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this lake wholly within the State of Arkansas?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there a navigable river which connects it with other States?

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes; it is in the sunk lands of the St. Francis River, which passes through Arkansas and into the State of Missouri. This bill has been submitted to the Secretary of War, and he has approved it. The committee also approve it. There is no objection from any source whatever.

Mr. DINGLEY. Observing from the language that it was wholly within the State of Arkansas, I wished to know whether there were navigable waters which connected this lake with other States.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Yes; there are navigable waters, but at this place scarcely any boats pass, and the provisions of the bill provide that the bridge shall be constructed in accordance with plans approved by the War Department.

The amendments recommended by the committee, set forth in the report, were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCULLOCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS IN TOWNS AND VILLAGES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Regular order.

Mr. SPERRY. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for the purpose of allowing me to present a bill which will not take more than five minutes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5473) concerning the delivery of letters in towns, villages, and other places where no free delivery exists. The bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. SPERRY. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall have to insist on the regular order. The consideration of that bill will take three or four hours. It will lead to a long debate.

Mr. SPERRY. No, it will not; it simply gives people a chance to do a certain thing and pay for it themselves, and there ought to be no objection to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There may not be, but I know it will lead to a long debate, and I shall have to insist on the regular order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to object to that bill, but I desire that it lie over.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred sundry resolutions, to wit:

"1. Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to appoint an additional reading clerk, whose term of office and salary, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, shall be the same as that now provided by law for a reading clerk of the House of Representatives.

"2. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to employ J. Y. Jamieson as special employee, his duties to exchange public documents for members of the House, at a salary of $900 per annum, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"3. Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint Fred S. Bishop as assistant clerk in the office which directs the special binding of public documents for the personal use of members of Congress, at a salary of $1,600 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until other provision is made therefor.

"4. Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer and typewriter, so long as may be necessary, for a period not to exceed three months from the adoption of this resolution, the same to be appointed by the chairman of the committee, subject to the approval of the committee, and to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

"5. Resolved, That the employees of the House of Representatives be paid their salaries semimonthly instead of monthly, the same as the other Departments.

"6. Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ E. J. Totten as a clerk at a salary of $1,200 per annum, beginning on the 1st day of January, 1896, and also one skilled laborer at a salary of $800 per annum, such salaries to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives. The said employees to be assigned to duty in the Clerk's document room of the House and to attend to the folding, packing, and shipping of the books and documents of the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, and perform such other duties as may be required.

"7. Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer and typewriter so long as may be necessary, for a period not to exceed three months from the adoption of this resolution, the same to be appointed by the chairman of the committee, subject to the approval of the committee, and to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

"8. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to employ 15 folders during the session and one month thereafter, at $75 per month each, and that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay the above employees out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

"9. Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a superintendent of the ladies' reception room at a compensation of $1,200 per annum"—

Beg leave to report as follows:

The resolution providing for an additional reading clerk is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the appointment of J. Y. Jamieson as special employee for the exchange of public documents for members of the House is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the appointment of Fred S. Bishop as assistant clerk in the office which directs the special binding of public documents for the personal use of members of Congress is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the payment of salaries to employees of the House semimonthly instead of monthly is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the appointment of E. J. Totten as a clerk, and also one skilled laborer, both to be assigned to duty in the Clerk's document room, is disapproved.

The resolution providing for the employment of 15 folders during the session, and one month thereafter, is herewith returned, with the recommendation that the same be adopted.

Resolutions Nos. 4 and 7 authorize the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on the District of Columbia to each employ a stenographer and typewriter for a period not to exceed three months, at the rate of $6 per day each.

Your committee are of the opinion that the exigencies of the situation justify it in recommending that a reasonable amount be allowed these two committees for the employment of stenographers for a limited period, and to that end submit the accompanying resolution as a substitute for those presented to it, and recommend the adoption of same.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following resolution:

That the chairmen of the Committees on Banking and Currency and the District of Columbia be authorized to expend not to exceed $150 each as compensation for the employment of stenographers and typewriters during the current session of Congress, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move the adoption of the substitute for the resolution just read.

The substitute was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the passage of the next resolution now, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ 15 folders during the session, and one month thereafter, at $75 per month each; and that the Clerk of the House be directed to pay the above employees out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXPERTS FOR COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution authorizing the Committee on Ways and Means to employ a suitable expert or experts, and to have done such printing as may be necessary, the expense of such services and printing not to exceed the sum of $1,500, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, beg to report and recommend the adoption of the same.

We attach herewith a report of the Committee on Ways and Means on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to foster and extend the export of the surplus agricultural and manufactured products of the United States to foreign countries; and

Whereas in certain countries the importation of these products is prohibited or restricted and subjected to burdensome inspection, intentional overvaluation, or discriminating duties: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and is hereby, directed to prepare and submit to this House a report which shall show in what countries such restrictions, regulations, or discriminations are in force, of what they consist, the causes alleged therefor, their effect upon our foreign commerce, and the effect upon the commercial treaties or agreements with foreign countries entered into after October 31, 1890, upon our trade with those countries, and also the effect of the subsequent abandonment of such treaties upon that trade.

Resolved, That for the purposes of making such investigation and report the committee be, and hereby is, authorized to employ a suitable expert or experts, and to have done such printing as may be necessary, the expense of such services and printing not to exceed the sum of $1,500, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. How did that resolution get before the House, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. On a report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CRISP. The Committee on Accounts reporting a resolution directing the Committee on Ways and Means to do something?

The SPEAKER. It was originally reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, and referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Accounts has no jurisdiction to so present that resolution as to make it privileged. The rules provide that reports from the Committee on Accounts touching expenditure out of the contingent fund of the House are privileged, and no other report from that committee.

The SPEAKER. This provides for payment out of the contingent fund.

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to direct another committee to perform another service, and incidentally provides that in the performance of that they may use a sum of money from the contingent fund. Now, surely, Mr.

Speaker, it could never be contended that a resolution of that sort would be privileged under the rule which permits the Committee on Accounts to report a resolution disposing of the contingent fund. That is a mere incident. The purpose of this resolution is to direct another committee of the House to perform certain acts; and I submit, in the first place, that the Committee on Accounts has no such jurisdiction; and, in the second place, if the committee has jurisdiction, that they can not report it as a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question as to the privilege might be subject to discussion, the House having referred it to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CRISP. How did the House refer it to the Committee on Accounts?

The SPEAKER. It was presented in a report from the Committee on Ways and Means, and as the Chair recollects, in open House it was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. You state that this was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means and the question was raised in regard to the expense.

Mr. CRISP. I did not so understand. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], or some gentleman on the Committee on Ways and Means, was this resolution favorably reported from the committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. It was favorably reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and being reported, the point of order having been made that it provided for an expenditure from the contingent fund, then, by the House, it was referred to the Committee on Accounts, which gives the Committee on Accounts jurisdiction, the only point being in reference to expenditure from the contingent fund.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the committee which has really——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor, unless he yields.

Mr. McMILLIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CRISP. Will the Speaker be kind enough to direct that the resolution be again read, so that some of my colleagues who were present may be able to remember something about it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will again be reported.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point is this: The House has never adopted this resolution. It was introduced, went to the Committee on Ways and Means, I am informed, was reported back favorably by that committee, and referred by the House, if you please, to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state exactly the status of the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. I would be very glad for the gentleman to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means to the House by myself. The report was made in the open House, whereupon I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report. Objection was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], and thereupon I asked unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Accounts, because it carried with it an appropriation from the contingent fund, and could not be considered in the House against an objection unless that committee had first considered it, and by unanimous consent it was referred by the House to the Committee on Accounts, and is now reported from that committee back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides, among the committees that shall have leave to report at any time:

> The Committee on Accounts, of all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House.

Now, the resolution which has just been read is for what? It is a resolution to authorize and require a certain investigation. Incidental to that investigation is an expenditure which may or may not be made out of the contingent fund of the House. That resolution has been referred to the Committee on Accounts by unanimous consent. I concede, as suggested by the Speaker, that perhaps would give the committee jurisdiction of the whole resolution; but it does not follow that that would make the whole resolution privileged when reported from the Committee on Accounts.

The regular method would have been to introduce a resolution providing for the payment of the expenditures of the Committee on Ways and Means to a given amount respecting this work. That would be proper after the House had authorized the Committee on Ways and Means to perform the work. But the peculiar situation presented here is that a resolution which is referred to the Committee on Accounts, no matter whether by the House or by an individual, and which instructs another committee of the House to enter upon a certain investigation, is reported back here as a matter of privilege, and it is contended that because it incidentally provides for the payment of certain expenses out of the contingent fund of the House the resolution thereby becomes privileged. I submit to the judgment of the Speaker, if he will reflect on it a moment, as to whether that is a proper contention.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia how a report from the Committee on Accounts, recommending an appropriation of $1,500 from the contingent fund to pay an expert for the Committee on Ways and Means, differs in principle from a report by the Committee on Accounts providing for the payment of a stenographer or any other assistant required by a committee?

The SPEAKER. The point the gentleman from Georgia makes, as the Chair understands it, is not in regard to the expenditure, but in regard to the resolution going beyond that and directing the Committee on Ways and Means to make a certain investigation.

Mr. HOPKINS. But that is a matter that has been already determined by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The resolution directing the expenditure of $1,500 from the contingent fund of the House, taken alone, might not be obnoxious to the objection; but the question is whether, joined to the other proposition, which has not received the sanction of the House, it can be the subject of a privileged report under the rule. That is a point on which the Chair would be glad to have some authority cited.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, no recommendation of an appropriation from the contingent fund can come before the House without being joined with some other proposition for the use of that appropriation. The House has to vote upon that question as well as upon the question of expenditure, and the matters are so intermingled that it seems to me they can hardly be separated. When an expenditure is recommended for a certain purpose, as, for instance, for an additional clerk, or whatever the purpose may be, the resolution always embraces both questions.

The SPEAKER. But while the Committee on Printing have the privilege of reporting upon all matters relating to the House printing, yet if they propose to print for an Executive Department the resolution ceases to be privileged, even though it may include something for the House. The Chair thinks that has been the general course of the decisions.

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, the Committee on Printing has jurisdiction of all matters relating to printing and the appropriations for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. But it has not privilege as to all matters relating to printing.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to two points. This resolution contains two distinct propositions. The first is, to expend a portion of the contingent fund, over which that committee has absolute jurisdiction. The other is, to make an investigation over which that committee would have no jurisdiction in the world unless by jurisdiction having been conferred through the reference of the resolution.

Now, the rules provide that, as to one class of its duties, the reports of the Committee on Accounts are privileged; but that means, at least by implication, that as to all other matters it is not privileged. Therefore, when a report comes in embracing two subjects-matter, one of which is privileged and the other not privileged, the nonprivileged matter carries the whole to the ground so far as the question of consideration is concerned. In addition to that, to show to what extent we would go in absurdity if we should adopt the contrary rule, if the contention of the gentlemen who hold that this matter can be considered as privileged under the rules is true, then all that will be necessary to confer jurisdiction on the Committee on Accounts to direct every other committee of this House as to what it shall consider and how it shall consider it will be to attach a little item of expenditure to the resolution providing for the investigation, and that will give the Committee on Accounts jurisdiction to report at any time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have here a decision bearing upon this question by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, in the second session of the Fiftieth Congress, reported in volume 90 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 47, in which was considered the question as to what effect nonprivileged matter in a report would have upon the privileged character of the report. That, as I understand it, is the point which the gentleman from Tennessee now makes, that this report just presented by the Committee on Accounts contains nonprivileged matter which in effect destroys the privileged character of the report. Now, if that were true, I have no hesitancy in saying that the point of order is well taken; but the Speaker will recognize the fact that the privileged part of this report is the appropriation of $1,500 from the contingent fund of the House, and that connected with that proposition is the purpose for which the appropriation is to be made. How can the Committee on Accounts present a report appropriating money from the contingent fund of the House without expressing the purpose for which the money is to be expended?

Now, that is all that that part of the resolution does which the gentleman from Tennessee claims is nonprivileged. It is merely an expression of the purpose for which the appropriation is to be made, and in the case which I have here Speaker Carlisle held that if the nonprivileged matter in a report was essential to the accomplishment of that which was privileged, then the nonprivileged matter did not destroy the privileged character of the report. The question arose in that case on a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands for the protection of the public lands and forfeiture of certain land grants, but the bill contained other provisions which were claimed to be nonprivileged, and in the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, upon the same bill, Mr. Cox, of New York, who was temporarily occupying the chair, ruled that the nonprivileged matter did destroy the privileged character of the report. The same bill came up at the beginning of the second session of the Fiftieth Congress when Mr. Carlisle was in the chair, and he was called upon to pass on the correctness of the decision made by Mr. Cox, and he overruled that decision, and in doing so used this language:

The second section, which directs the Attorney-General to institute suits, provides simply a means for the accomplishment of the object which the bill contemplates; and the Chair thinks that the point raised by the gentleman from New York, that nonprivileged matter can not be connected with privileged matter in a bill, does not arise in this instance. The Chair has held, and will continue to hold, that nonprivileged matter can not be connected with privileged matter, unless it be something which is essential to the accomplishment of that part of the bill which is privileged; and the Chair thinks that is the case here. With great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from New York who presided when this question was presented before, the Chair feels constrained to hold that this is a matter of privilege, and so decides.

Now, in the present instance, I take it that the purpose for which the money is to be expended, being expressed in the same resolution, does not destroy, in accordance with the ruling I have just cited, the privileged character of the report. It is essential to the accomplishment of the purpose of the resolution, which itself is privileged; and being so, and necessarily so, is carried with that part of the report which is privileged; otherwise it is impossible, as suggested to me by the gentleman from Iowa, to divide the matter and make an intelligent report.

Certainly the Speaker would not hesitate to hold that a report simply to appropriate money out of the contingent fund, without expressing any purpose for which it is to be appropriated, could not be entertained or considered by the House. Now, the committee in this case, having had jurisdiction of the matter, and properly, too, by unanimous consent of the House, have considered the advisability of making the appropriation for the purpose contemplated and expressed in the resolution. Under such circumstances it seems impossible for the Speaker to hold otherwise than that that part of the resolution which does not relate directly to the expenditure of money from the contingent fund should be considered as privileged when connected with admittedly privileged matter, because it is an essential part of the resolution, which would otherwise authorize the appropriation of money from the contingent fund without providing any purpose whatever to which it is to be applied.

In the Manual, on page 528, this reference is made to the question under consideration:

As a general rule the insertion of matter not privileged in a proposition otherwise privileged destroys the privileged character of the report. The rule is, however, liberally construed, and if the proposed addition is substantially in aid of the privileged object the whole matter is held to be privileged.

And I think this resolution comes clearly within the rule here stated in the Manual, and is also supported by the ruling I have already cited made by Mr. Carlisle and the Fiftieth Congress. If the purpose for which the expenditure is authorized is not essential to the accomplishment of that part of the resolution which authorizes the expenditure, then it would be such nonprivileged matter as would destroy the privileged character of the report. But such is not the case. Take away the purpose of the resolution or the object of the expenditure and nothing remains; hence it must be essential, and if essential, it does not have that effect.

Mr. CRISP. If the Chair has any doubts whatever on the proposition I will ask to say a word or two.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it must be so plain that there can be no doubt whatever about it. A resolution is introduced for the purpose of requiring the Committee on Ways and Means to perform a certain duty. That is the object of the resolution. No man in looking at that resolution ever could have denominated it as a resolution to pay money out of the contingent fund of the House. It was simply a resolution directing the Committee on Ways and Means to perform a certain duty. That resolution would be referred by the Speaker, as it was referred by him, to the Committee on Ways and Means. That is conclusive of the idea that the Speaker thought that committee had jurisdiction of the proposition. The committee considered it and reported it back.

But the committee, mark you, did not ask the judgment of the House upon it. If the Committee on Ways and Means had reported that resolution back, striking out the appropriation, and the House had adopted the resolution instructing the committee to perform the duty that the resolution contemplated, then a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Maine, or some other member of the committee, providing for the payment from the contingent fund of the House of a sufficient sum to enable the committee to perform the duty, would have been privileged. But to hold that this is privileged because it incidentally provides for a payment from the contingent fund would be to hold that if I should introduce a resolution to-morrow directing the Committee on Agriculture to make an investigation and providing at the same time for an expenditure of $100 from the contingent fund, that no matter what the character of the resolution may be, the Committee on Accounts could take it because of that addition and make it privileged. If I introduce a resolution to investigate the Navy Department, or the construction of ships, and attach a provision that the incidental expense necessary to the investigation is to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, that, under the contention of my friend from Minnesota, would make it privileged.

Now, this resolution reported from the Committee on Ways and Means is not privileged. The Committee on Ways and Means have the privilege of reporting at any time on certain measures. This is not a measure of that character. All bills or resolutions which the committee may report on are not privileged. But, by this mere act of referring it to the Committee on Accounts, the gentleman contends that committee has jurisdiction to report it at any time, and makes privileged a matter that would otherwise not be privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman what effect the fact that the House had received by unanimous consent the report of the Committee on Ways and Means and acted upon it by referring it to the Committee on Accounts would have on the question of privilege?

Mr. CRISP. How was it referred?

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on Accounts by the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. By unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That is action by the House, perhaps, in the highest form.

Mr. CRISP. How would that change the character of the measure?

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker Carlisle on a similar occasion held that such a reference was simply like a unanimous vote of the House referring the matter, carrying no other authority; and it will not be insisted upon that the House acted on the fundamental proposition involved in this resolution at all.

The SPEAKER. The point which the Chair is suggesting is the reception by the House and then committing it.

Mr. McMILLIN. But then, Mr. Speaker, the House was bound to receive it. We then presume that the House was not satisfied with the action of the Ways and Means Committee and determined to try another committee, and it places it on no higher ground than if it had been introduced originally and sent to that committee. It is a recommittal of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, the point is this: Concede that the House referred it. Concede that the House referred it by a vote, or by unanimous consent. Unless there went with it the right to report at any time, the Committee on Accounts acquire jurisdiction of it by the reference of the House simply as they would have acquired jurisdiction by a private reference; and when it reaches the Committee on Accounts its privileged character is to be determined by the resolution. Now, what is the resolution? What would you denominate it if you were speaking of that resolution? Would you denominate it a resolution to appropriate money from the contingent fund of the House? Would you not denominate it a resolution authorizing the Ways and Means Committee to make investigation? If you would, Mr. Speaker, then the Committee on Accounts has no right to report at any time a resolution authorizing the Committee on Ways and Means to make an investigation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question is too plain for argument. The rule invoked by the gentleman would absolutely overturn the rules of the House, and overturn the decisions heretofore made on these questions, that the insertion of matter not privileged in a proposition otherwise privileged destroys the privileged character of the report. That is the general rule, the sensible rule, and if it be not now maintained, then, Mr. Speaker, around this Committee on Accounts, which was designed and intended merely to disburse the contingent fund of the House, can be gathered and reported all the important business of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Suppose this resolution, having been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, had gone onto the Calendar and come up for consideration, being called up by that committee. Does the gentleman say that it could have been considered in this House against the objection of any member—providing as it does for the appropriation of money from the contingent fund of the House—without first having been considered by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. CRISP. That portion of it, perhaps, could not.

Mr. TAWNEY. How can you separate the parts of the resolution? It would take away from it its purpose, and you would have no resolution at all.

Mr. CRISP. Since I have been here it has been the uniform rule, so far as I know, that where a committee reports back a resolution for an investigation they either report it appropriating the money or they make no provision for it, and when the committee is directed to do a thing, the chairman of that committee introduces a resolution reciting that, whereas the committee has been directed to make an investigation, resolved, that a certain sum be appropriated out of the contingent fund for that purpose. That resolution goes to the Committee on Accounts; but they do not consider the propriety of making the investigation. That is no part of the business of the Committee on Accounts; but they merely consider the propriety of appropriating money to enable the expenses of that investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand the gentleman from Georgia, his objection is not to the fact that the Committee on Accounts have now jurisdiction of the resolution?

Mr. CRISP. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But his objection is to the question of its privileged character?

Mr. CRISP. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. When the House, by unanimous consent committed this resolution, it had embodied in it not only the appropriation of the money, but the direction for its expenditure. Now, did not that clothe this committee with authority to report the resolution?

Mr. CRISP. Suppose you grant that. The question is, is it privileged?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The committee reporting a resolution which it has jurisdiction of, which provides for the expenditure of money and states the purpose of expenditure, it seems to me carries with it the right to report it as a privileged question.

Mr. CRISP. To me it seems so plain that I do not care to argue it further, merely suggesting that if you adopt that practice, it embarrasses every stage of the proceedings of this House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The fault may perhaps be with the House in consenting to clothe this committee with the jurisdiction of the whole matter.

Mr. CRISP. But that can not give authority to the committee to report at any time unless the House consents that they may report at any time.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But the House committed the resolution to the committee and the committee have that privilege.

Mr. TAWNEY. Just one word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia. I fail to see, after reading paragraph 57 of Rule XI, how he can possibly attach to this report the limitations that he now seeks to attach to it:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated.

Then it goes on to name the committees—and to the Committee on Accounts touching all matters of expenditures of the contingent fund of the House. Now, the only question is whether or not that part of the resolution which does not expressly relate to the expenditure of money from the contingent fund is nonprivileged, or, in other words, is not essential to that part of the resolution which is clearly privileged, and which the gentleman from Georgia himself admits is privileged in this resolution, and if it is essential to the accomplishment of that which is made a privilege by the rules of the House, then it certainly retains its privileged character, notwithstanding the fact that it directs a committee of this House to make a certain investigation which the gentleman says is nonprivileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks——

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment. I think that a great deal depends in this matter upon the force that is given to the resolution, which apparently directs the Committee on Ways and Means to do a thing which they are already authorized to do. It was entirely unnecessary that it should have been put in that form, because the Committee on Ways and Means have entire authority now to investigate this whole question of reciprocity and the effect of reciprocal legislation. They do not need any authority. The only thing they come to the House for is authority to appoint an expert in order to carry on their business, just the same as committees come in here and ask for a stenographer to carry on their business. If this resolution had been couched in this form:

Resolved, That for the purpose of making an inquiry into the effects of reciprocal duties the Committee on Ways and Means is hereby authorized to appoint an expert at a salary of $1,500, or at an expense of $1,500, to be paid from the contingent fund of the House—

there could be no question of its being privileged when reported from the Committee on Accounts. It is simply the form in which it is presented that gives an appearance of giving authority—that we are giving some authority to the Committee on Ways and Means that they do not now have. We do give particular authority that the committee has not now. All that the Committee on Ways and Means asks is that they shall have authority in conducting the investigation which they have determined to make to expend not to exceed $1,500 from the contingent fund of the House in the employment of experts or otherwise.

Mr. GROUT. Then, if the gentleman will allow me a suggestion, it is simply a question of expense.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no authority given in this resolution.

Mr. CRISP. Then the gentleman did not hear the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. I confess the resolution is couched in a form that appears to give authority to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CRISP. It directs them.

Mr. DINGLEY. I confess it does in that particular form; but as the gentleman from Georgia is well aware, while it appears in the form as presented to give them authority, it is simply that the Committee on Ways and Means shall have authority to employ an expert. That is all they ask for, and a mere change in the phraseology of the resolution would at once remove every objection that can be urged against it.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the form is very distinct. It has within it the conferring of authority upon a committee that is certainly not a privileged matter upon which the Committee on Accounts can report, and the fact that they have the privilege of reporting on expenditures out of the contingent fund does not give them the privilege of reporting upon nonprivileged matters. That is the general principle that runs through the rules of the House. And the Chair is very glad, in deciding that the resolution is not in order, that it does not prevent the Committee on Ways and Means from presenting it, as the chairman suggests, in proper form to obtain the report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. DINGLEY. The committee will simply change the phraseology to make it conform to the rules.

Mr. LOUD. The suggestion that I desired to make was to withdraw the resolution so as to avoid this contention.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. I withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER. The report is withdrawn.

REPORT OF MAJ. ANSON MILLS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed at the earliest day practicable 500 copies, in separate form, with paper covers, of the report of Maj. Anson Mills, United States Army, dated October 10, 1889, to the Director of the Geological Survey on the subject of his investigations and surveys for an international dam and reservoir on the Rio Grande del Norte for the purpose of controlling the flood waters of said river and preserving the boundary between the United States and Mexico, with the five appendixes, A, B, C, D, and E, attached thereto, using the same plates for diagrams and maps that were used in the printing of the Annuals of the Geological Survey, eleventh, part second, pages 54 and 56, and thirteenth, part third, page 410.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois who offered the resolution.

Mr. HITT. The number of copies provided to be printed is 500. The document is one really having little or no interest to most of the members of the House. The resolution was introduced at the request of the Secretary of State, the minister from Mexico, and the commissioners who are now engaged upon the boundary dispute. The documents in question are technical in character. I know that they would be of very little concern to members, and therefore I move to amend by inserting after the word "printed" "for the use of the Committee on Foreign Affairs." I can assure the House that the committee will have a proper number of the documents sent to the Secretary of State and the Mexican minister, and to those gentlemen of the House who have districts that are concerned in the Southwestern portion of the country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF TIME IN WHICH SUITS MAY BE BROUGHT TO VACATE AND ANNUL PATENTS UPON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for the extension of the time within which suits may be brought to vacate and annul patents upon public lands, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent to lands heretofore erroneously issued under a special grant shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act, and suits to vacate and annul patents hereafter issued shall only be brought within ten years after the date of the issuance of such patents. But no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

SEC. 2. That if any person claiming to be a bona fide purchaser of any lands erroneously patented or certified shall present his claim to the Secretary of the Interior prior to the institution of a suit to cancel a patent or certification, and if it shall appear that he is a bona fide purchaser, the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons for whose benefit the certification was made, for the value of said land, which in no case shall be less than minimum Government price thereof nor more than the amount paid by the purchaser to the original grantee of the United States, and the title of such claimant shall stand confirmed. An adverse decision by the Secretary of the Interior on the bona fides of such claimant shall not be conclusive of his rights, and if such claimant or one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser, but who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior, is made a party to such suit, and if found by the court to be a bona fide purchaser, the court shall decree a confirmation of the title and shall render a decree in behalf of the United States for the value of the land as hereinbefore provided. Any bona fide purchaser of lands patented or certified to a railroad company, and who is not made a party of such suit, and who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior, may establish his right as such bona fide purchaser in any United States court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, or at his option, as prescribed in sections 3 and 4 of chapter 376 of the acts of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

SEC. 3. That if at any time prior to the institution of suit by the Attorney-General to cancel any patent or certification of lands erroneously patented or certified, a claim or statement is presented to the Secretary of the Interior by or on behalf of any person or persons, corporation or corporations, claiming that such person or persons, corporation or corporations, is a bona fide purchaser or are bona fide purchasers of any patented or certified land by deed or contract, or otherwise, from or through the original patentee or corporation to which patent or certification was issued, no suit or action shall be brought to cancel or annul the patent or certification for said land until such claim is investigated in said Department of the Interior; and if it shall appear that such person or corporation is a bona fide purchaser as aforesaid, or that such persons or corporations are such bona fide purchasers, then no such suit shall be instituted and the title of such claimant or claimants shall stand confirmed; but the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons for whose benefit the patent was issued or certification was made for the value of the land, as hereinbefore specified.

Amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Line 4 of section 1, after the words "under a," insert the words "railroad, Mexican, Spanish, or other."

Also, after the word "patents," in lines 8 and 9, insert "and the limitation of section 8 of chapter 561 of the acts of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress and amendments thereto is extended accordingly as to the patents herein referred to."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of this bill.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

On the 17th day of January, 1896, the President sent to Congress a message in relation to the expiration of the limitation provided in the act of March 3, 1891. Under the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat L., 256), the Interior Department was directed to adjust all the various railway and other land grants as speedily as practicable, and whenever it was ascertained that lands had been erroneously patented the law provided that actions should be brought to cancel the same.

Provisions are embraced in the act of 1887 to protect settlers and purchasers by giving them preferential rights in case of the cancellation of their patents.

These proceedings of necessity caused much disturbance among land titles, and although the purpose involved was the laudable one of protecting the Government by correcting mistakes and overturning fraudulent patents, a sense of insecurity and loss of confidence in the integrity of patent titles became a serious drawback to the settlement and improvement of some parts of the country.

In order that all these questions might be speedily adjusted, and that any proposed litigation for the purpose of annulling patent titles should be promptly brought, the limitation act of 1891 was passed, requiring that all such suits as to patents already issued should be commenced within five years, or prior to March 3, 1896, and that as to patents subsequently issued suits to cancel the same should be brought within six years after the date of the patent.

The Commissioner of the Land Office on the 18th of December, 1895, addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Interior, suggesting an extension of time by amendment to the act of 1891. The Secretary of the Interior communicated with the President upon the subject, recommending the repeal of the limitation altogether. Thereupon the President sent a message on the subject to Congress, asking for a repeal of section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891.

We will set out in an appendix to this report the message and other communications above referred to.

The Committee on the Public Lands have patiently examined the whole subject and invited before them all persons interested in the question, as also the Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

There has been a large variety of land grants which will be affected by the proposed extension of the limitation. The Commissioner of the General Land Office was of the opinion that it would require ten years more to adjust the grant under the act of 1887, and therefore thought the limitation should be extended ten years.

In the adjustment of these grants it is not practicable for more than from two to four clerks in the General Land Office to work at one time without having duplicates made of certain lists or records. With this small force the adjustment has slowly proceeded for the last nine years, and over 60,000,000 acres still remain unadjusted. It appears, however, that by active diligence about 12,000,000 acres have been adjusted in the last year. At this rate the work could be completed in five years more.

But even if it could not be done with the present force, the committee are of the opinion that duplicate copies of lists and documents or records ought to be made to expedite this work, and that the time ought not to be extended more than five years.

While it is important that the rights of the Government should be cared for, and that a reasonable time for adjustment of these patented grants should be given, it is also of the highest importance that the validity of the Government patents should be examined as speedily as practicable so that former settlers and those who wish to become settlers or purchasers of these lands may know that the Government patent issued by the highest authority of the nation shall be evidence of a final and complete character that the Government's title has been lawfully transferred.

Under existing law, and in the absence of any limitation, a settler may buy a home upon one of these grants, and after occupying it for years, under the faith of a patent regularly issued and recorded, find himself made a party to a long, vexatious, and expensive litigation, and in the end be permitted to buy the land again from the Government or to enter it under the homestead laws.

That such a thing may occur for a reasonable time is perhaps the necessary consequence of fraud and mistake in patents, but that such a condition should be kept open without limit is an intolerable blemish upon the titles purporting to come from the Government. If a private individual sells and conveys lands, and they pass into innocent hands, the purchaser is protected as against his grantor, and time will protect him against all comers. But as against the United States, in the absence of a limitation law, he is never secure and may be subjected to annoyance and expense and possible loss of his land at any time.

A private individual may have obtained a patent for a homestead, tree claim, or preemption claim, and after selling the same the purchaser, who has bought upon the faith of the Government patent, may be harassed by proceedings in the courts hundreds of miles away, with a possible appeal to the expensive forms of the court of appeals, and the still more expensive and clogged tribunal of the United States Supreme Court.

To remedy these defects the act of 1891 was enacted. On account of the large land grants involved, and the fact that it has not been found practicable to adjust them within so short a time, we think that a bill giving five years' longer limitation ought to pass, but we do not believe that this extension of time ought to affect bona fide purchasers; that as to them the limitation of the act of 1891 ought to operate as a final bar when the time first limited shall expire.

But as to the original patentees, no great injustice will be done to them by extending the time five years longer, and within that time we think that the grants can be all adjusted. The shortness of this time, it is true, may put the Interior Department to some inconvenience, and it may involve some extra expense for clerical work, but the importance of bringing to an end all disputes upon the part of the Government as against its own patent titles is so evident as to need but little argument in its support.

Your committee have prepared and presented a bill which will carry out the purposes outlined in this report, and we recommend its passage.

We can not agree with the President that public policy requires that there should be no limitation as against the Government in these cases.

We have had unpleasant object lessons in many of the Spanish grants, whose limits are as elastic and uncertain as the Venezuelan boundary. The presence of these disputed titles has cast a blight over some of our most beautiful lands for more than a generation. There should be some time fixed when such a condition shall cease to exist.

The limitation may perfect titles in some instances founded in more or less of fraud or mistake. So it happens with all such statutes, but universal experience has demonstrated the necessity of such statutes.

Most of the States of the Union have adopted statutes which will bind the States themselves. Such statutes have been found to work well. To require the sovereign power to proceed in a reasonable time if it wishes to avoid or nullify its own acts is a just provision in behalf of its individual citizens. The absence of limitation excuses delays on the part of officials, and that which may be done at any time, however distant in the future, is much less likely to be attended to in the present.

We are informed that as to some of these land grants the greater part that has been patented has been sold to third persons. That was the very purpose of the land grants. It was not intended that these grants in aid of public improvements should be tied up indefinitely and withheld from settlement.

It was the theory of the projectors of such enterprises that these lands would be brought into markets by the building of railways and that the railway companies would be interested in selling them on long time at low prices and at low rates of interest to actual settlers who would furnish a carrying business for the new lines. It ought not to be the policy of the Government to harass or annoy one of these settlers by any litigation whatever.

The policy of making railway grants has been long since abandoned. The adjustment of those made should proceed with all reasonable speed, so that the transactions may be closed.

The railway companies themselves have encouraged delay by failing to procure their patents, in order to avoid local taxation. One of the purposes of the act of 1891 was to encourage the patenting of such lands, so that they might become subject to such taxation, and that their sale and settlement might be encouraged.

The bill which the committee presents with this report is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent to lands heretofore erroneously issued under a special grant shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act, and suits to vacate and annul patents hereafter issued shall only be brought within ten years after the date of the issuance of such patents. But no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

"SEC. 2. That if any person claiming to be a bona fide purchaser of any lands erroneously patented or certified shall present his claim to the Secretary of the Interior prior to the institution of a suit to cancel a patent or certification, and if it shall appear that he is a bona fide purchaser, the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons, for whose benefit the certification was made, for the value of said land, which in no case shall be less than minimum Government price thereof, nor more than the amount paid by the purchaser to the original grantee of the United States, and the title of such claimant shall stand confirmed. An adverse decision by the Secretary of the Interior on the bona fides of such claimant shall not be conclusive of his rights, and if such claimant, or one claiming to be a bona fide purchaser, but who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior, is made a party to such suit, and if found by the court to be a bona fide purchaser, the court shall decree a confirmation of the title, and shall render a decree in behalf of the United States for the value of the land as hereinbefore provided. Any bona fide purchaser of lands patented or certified to a railroad company, and who is not made a party of such suit (and who has not submitted his claim to the Secretary of the Interior), may establish his right as such bona fide purchaser in any United States court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, or at his option as prescribed in sections 3 and 4 of chapter 376 of the acts of the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

"SEC. 3. If at any time prior to the institution of suit by the Attorney-General to cancel any patent or certification of lands erroneously patented or certified, a claim or statement is presented to the Secretary of the Interior by or on behalf of any person or persons, corporation or corporations, claiming that such person or persons, corporation or corporations, is a bona fide purchaser, or are bona fide purchasers of any patented or certified land, by deed, or contract, or otherwise from or through the original patentee or corporation to which patent or certification was issued, no suit or action shall be brought to cancel or annul the patent or certification for said land until such claim is investigated in said Department of the Interior; and if it shall appear that such person or corporation is a bona fide purchaser as aforesaid, or that such persons or corporations are such bona fide purchasers, then no such suit shall be instituted, and the title of such claimant or claimants shall stand confirmed; but the Secretary of the Interior shall request that suit be brought in such case against the patentee, or the corporation, company, person, or association of persons, for whose benefit the patent was issued or certification was made, for the value of the land as hereinbefore specified."

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, members of the Committee on the Public Lands, think that the Government should not be prevented from initiating proceedings to correct the fraud or errors of its agents or grantees, by which much of the public domain may be passed to corporations and syndicates. We propose the following substitute for the bill reported by the committee.

THOS. C. McRAE.
O. W. UNDERWOOD.

A bill to repeal section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; the act entitled "An act to amend section 8 of an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," and the act entitled "An act to extend the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, concerning prosecutions for cutting timber on public lands, to Wyoming, New Mexico, and Arizona," approved February 13, 1893, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

APPENDIX.

We here set out the President's message and the departmental correspondence upon which it was based:

[House Document No. 151, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Congress:

I desire to invite attention to the necessity for prompt legislation in order to remove the limitation of the time within which suits may be brought by the Government to annul unlawful or unauthorized grants of public lands.

By the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stats., 556), the Secretary of the Interior is directed to adjust each of the railroad land grants which may be unadjusted, and it is provided, if it shall appear, upon the completion of such adjustment or sooner, that the lands have been from any cause erroneously certified or patented by the United States to or for the use of a company claiming under any of said grants, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to demand a reconveyance of the title to all lands so erroneously certified or patented, and on failure of the company to make such reconveyance within ninety days the Attorney-General is required to institute and prosecute in the proper courts necessary proceedings to restore title to said lands to the United States. The demands made under this act have been numerous, and in some cases have resulted in the reinvestment of title to the lands in the United States upon demand, but in most cases the demand has been refused and suits have been necessary.

The work of adjustment has been unavoidably slow. The said act makes provision for the reinstatement of entries erroneously canceled on account of railroad withdrawals, and, upon certain conditions, provides for the confirmation of titles derived by purchase from the companies of lands shown to be excepted from the grants. It contemplates a disposition of every tract described by the granting act, situated within the primary or granted limits; an inspection of each tract certified or patented to the company within such limit, to determine whether such certification or patenting was proper; the listing of those tracts shown to be erroneously certified, and the determination for what tracts lost to the grant indemnity is to be allowed.

It is necessary, in making such an adjustment, that all questions of conflicting claims, either between settlers and the road or between two roads, the grants for which conflict or overlap, be finally disposed of, so that a proper disposition of the land can be shown in the adjustment. While adjustments have proceeded with the utmost rapidity consistent with a due regard for the rights of the settlers, of the United States, and the railroad companies, and while to this end the force of adjusters has been largely augmented in the General Land Office, many of the grants yet remain unadjusted.

In some of the grants, notably the corporation grants, the lack of surveys up to the present time made the completion of the work impossible.

Decisions rendered by the Interior Department in numerous conflicts have been carried into the courts. The construction of the Interior Department has generally been sustained when final determination has been reached, but many of the cases are still pending in the courts, not yet having been decided. Some of these cases, while involving immediately the title to only one particular tract, will, when decided, furnish a rule of construction to control the disposition of the title to thousands of acres of other lands in the same situation. Until the courts pass upon these questions final adjustments can not be made.

By section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., 1099), it is expressly enacted that suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent theretofore issued "shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act." This period of five years will expire on the 3d of March, 1896. Of course no suit by the United States to secure the cancellation of a patent in this class of cases after that date would be effective. Indeed, it is now too late to initiate proceedings looking to any such suit, inasmuch as demand has to be first made on the company, and thereafter ninety days must be allowed for compliance or refusal, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887. Before the expiration of this period the statute would bar the right of recovery by the Government, and the benefits of anticipated favorable decisions of the courts would be lost so far as they might determine the character and disposition of grants similar to those directly involved in pending cases.

It will be readily seen that if this act of limitations is to remain on the statute books the portion of the adjustment act referred to would be rendered nugatory. Indeed, there would be but little use in continuing the adjustment of many of the land grants, inasmuch as ascertained rights of the United States or of settlers could not be enforced by law.

Legislation establishing limitations against the right of the Government to sue is an innovation not entirely consistent with the general history of the rights of the Government, for it has uniformly been held that time did not bar the sovereign power from the assertion of a right.

The early adjudications of the Land Department construed the grants with a degree of liberality toward the grantees which later decisions of the courts and of the Department have not sustained. It seems clear that the further progress of adjustments will develop facts and transactions in connection with these land grants which ought to be the subjects of legal examination and scrutiny before they are allowed to become final and conclusive. The Government should not be prevented from going into the courts to right wrongs perpetrated by its agents or any other parties, and by which much of the public domain may be diverted from the people at large to corporate uses.

In these circumstances, it seems to me that the act of 1891 should be so amended as not to apply to suits brought to recover title to lands certified or patented on account of railroad or other grants. And I respectfully urge upon Congress speedy action to the end suggested, so that the adjustment of these grants may proceed without the interposition of a bar, through lapse of time, against the right of recovery by the Government in proper cases.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 17, 1896.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 27, 1895.

SIR: I beg leave to invite your attention to the provisions of section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 1099), where it is enacted that suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patents theretofore issued "shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act," which, in my opinion and that of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, ought to be repealed. In order that you may fully understand the situation, I beg to submit the following observations:

By the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 556), the Secretary of the Interior is directed to adjust each of the railroad land grants which may be unadjusted; and it is provided if it shall appear, upon the completion of such adjustment, or sooner, that lands have been from any cause erroneously certified or patented by the United States to or for the use of a company claiming under any of said grants, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to demand a reconveyance of the title to all lands so erroneously certified or patented; and on failure of the company to make such reconveyance within ninety days the Attorney-General is required to institute and prosecute, in the proper courts, necessary proceedings to restore title to said lands to the United States.

The said act also makes provision for the reinstatement of entries erroneously canceled on account of railroad withdrawals, and, upon certain conditions, for the confirmation of titles derived by purchase of the companies of lands shown to be excepted from the grants.

The demands made under this act have been numerous, and in some cases have resulted in the reinvestment of title to the land in the United States; but in most cases the demand has been refused or no response made thereto, and suits have been necessary.

The work of adjustment contemplates a disposition of every tract described by the granting act situated within the primary or granted limits; an inspection of each tract certified or patented to the company within such limit, to determine whether such certification or patenting was proper; the listing of those tracts shown to be erroneously certified, and the determination for what tracts lost to the grant indemnity is allowable.

It is necessary, in making such an adjustment, that all questions of conflicting claims, either between settlers and the road or between two roads the grants for which conflict or overlap, be finally disposed of so that a proper disposition of the land can be shown in the adjustment.

In some of the grants, notably the corporation grants, the lack of surveys renders an immediate adjustment impossible.

Decisions have been made by this Department in the matter of numerous conflicts and the cases have been carried into the courts.

So far as the same have reached final determination they have generally been favorable to the construction of this Department, but many are still pending in the courts.

Under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887 (supra), the adjustment of the railroad land grants has proceeded with the utmost rapidity consistent with a due regard for the rights of the settlers, of the United States, and the railroad companies. To this end the force of adjusters has been largely augmented in the General Land Office; and when deemed advantageous, the hours of work have been prolonged even until late at night. And when any such adjustment has been submitted to the Secretary for consideration and approval, as is required in every instance, prompt action has always been taken, such work being treated as "special."

Notwithstanding these extraordinary efforts, many of the grants yet remain unadjusted, though much and very rapid progress has been made. But from the nature of the many difficulties and complications connected with the work, the recital of which would occupy too much space herein, it has been, and is, both a moral and physical impossibility to close the adjustment of these grants as speedily as desired. Some of the cases now pending in the courts involve actually the title to only one particular tract, while a decision upon the questions therein would control the disposition of the title to thousands of acres of other lands in the same category.

When these important matters will be decided it is almost impossible to say, but certainly not before March 3, 1896. Should these questions be decided favorable to the Government, the favorable decision could not necessarily be made to inure to its benefit as to the other lands the title to which was not by actual description embraced in said decision, because, by section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 1099), it is expressly enacted that suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent theretofore issued "shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act." This period of five years will expire on the 3d of March, 1896.

Of course, no suit by the United States to secure the cancellation of a patent in this class of cases after that date would amount to anything. Indeed, it is now too late to initiate proceedings looking to any such suit, inasmuch as demand has to be first made on the company, and thereafter ninety days must be allowed for compliance or refusal in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887 (supra), before the expiration of which time the statute would bar the right of recovery by the Government.

Recent decisions of the Supreme Court have greatly affected the previous dispositions made under railroad grants, but will facilitate the progress of the adjustment of grants, notably, Northern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Bardon (154 U. S., 288); Northern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Bardon (145 U. S., 535); Whitney vs. Taylor (158 U. S., 85), and United States vs. St. Paul and Sioux City Railroad (159 U. S., 349).

It will be readily seen that if this act of limitations is to remain on the statute books the portion of the adjustment act of 1887, before cited, would be rendered nugatory. Indeed, there would be but little use in continuing the adjustment of many of the land grants, inasmuch as ascertained rights of the United States or of settlers could not be enforced by power of law. By this denial to the Government of the right to go into court and ascertain its rights the railroad companies would profit very largely, as it is a well-known fact, capable of abundant substantiation by the records of the Land Office, that the early adjudications of the Land Department construed the grants with a degree of liberality toward the grantees which, by later decisions, is declared not to have been warranted by law.

Should, therefore, the statute of limitations make them secure in the enjoyment of the lands thus obtained, it is entirely inconsistent with experience to suppose for a moment they would, on an impotent demand, voluntarily surrender anything that the law secures them the enjoyment of.

It is submitted, with due respect, that the legislation of Congress establishing this limitation against the Government is an innovation utterly inconsistent in my opinion, with the theory of our institutions, and seems likely to result almost entirely in benefiting the interests of the corporations and adversely to those of the Government. From time immemorial it has been held that limitations did not bar the sovereign power from the assertion of a right. And in this country the highest judicial tribunals have uniformly held that laches was not to be imputed to the Government, which could only act through its agents. But in this matter the Government is barred from righting the wrongs, whether intentional or inadvertent, perpetrated by those agents against the people at large, by which much of the public property has been perverted to corporate uses.

Statutes of limitations are regarded favorably because of the repose they give against stale claims, the presumption being that after the lapse of a reasonable time they have been asserted and adjusted or waived.

But this presumption does not arise where, from circumstances, no proper opportunity has been afforded for the assertion of the claims, as, for instance, during the existence of the disabilities of minority, coverture, or the like. And certainly such presumption can not arise in the matter of these land grants, where, as is abundantly shown, from the very nature of the case, the rights of the Government are ascertainable with so much difficulty.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that the act of 1891 should be so amended as not to apply to suits brought to recover title to lands certified or patented on account of railroad or other grants. And I respectfully request that you urge upon Congress to take speedy action, as suggested, that there may be no delay in the adjustment of these grants and no bar, by lapse of time, against the right of recovery by the Government in a proper case.

Herewith is transmitted copy of the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to me on this subject. Your attention is invited to the fact that in recommending the repeal of the existing law he suggests the reenactment of limitations of ten years within which suits are to be brought to secure cancellation of patents. I do not entirely concur in this suggestion of the Commissioner, but think, for reasons herein stated, it would be best to repeal the limitations absolutely, and leave the law as it existed prior to the passage of said act of March 3, 1891.

Very respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1895.

SIR: On March 3, 1891, an act of Congress entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," was approved by the President. (26 Stat., 1095.) Section 8 of said act provided, among other things, "that suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent heretofore issued shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act, and suits to vacate and annul patents hereafter issued shall only be brought within six years after the date of the issue of such patents." And by another act, approved the same day (26 Stat. L., 1093), entitled "An act to amend section 8 of an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,'" the same proviso was enacted. It will be observed that this section makes no exception, but applies to all patents.

By act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 256), directions were given for the adjustment of all grants by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the recovery by the United States of title to lands which from any cause have been erroneously certified or patented under such grants, and said act requires that the adjustments be made in accordance with the rulings of the United States Supreme Court. Therefore, as conveyances under these grants date as far back as 1850 and were made under various court and departmental rulings, it is not surprising that many of said conveyances have been and will be found, under the construction now given such grants by the Supreme Court, to have been erroneous.

A number of these grants have been examined with a view to their adjustment, and rules have been laid to show cause why suits should not be instituted for recovery of title in some cases, and demands for reconveyance have been made in others, but very few have been finally adjusted and closed, not more than a dozen; and most of these examinations, nearly all in fact, were made prior to the rulings of the United States Supreme Court in the cases of Mary Bardon vs. Northern Pacific Railroad (145 U. S., 535) and Whitney vs. Taylor (158 U. S., 85), which so change the previous rulings of the court, as construed by this Department, as to make necessary a reexamination of all railroad land grants, excepting the few finally closed and some half dozen examined since the decision in the case of Whitney vs. Taylor, above referred to. The Department so held in its letters of July 18, 1895, in the case of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, and September 5, 1895, in the case of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company of Iowa.

There are 79 land-grant railroads and 7 land-grant wagon roads.

Under the provisions of section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891, as originally passed and amended as aforesaid, the time within which the United States can legally bring suit for the recovery of lands erroneously patented prior to March 3, 1891, will expire March 3, 1896, unless an extension be made by Congress.

The work of adjusting these grants is one of great magnitude, and the division of the office charged with its execution is also charged with the consideration and determination of all questions relating to or arising out of conflicts between grants by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon roads, canals, and river improvements and rights of way over the public lands for railroads, canals, ditches, and reservoirs, and its current work must be kept up. It is also charged with the administration of the grant of desert lands to certain States.

It is clear, therefore, that the time within which the United States may bring suit for the recovery of land erroneously certified or patented under these grants must be extended or that the interests of the Government, and in many instances those of private citizens, must suffer. I have accordingly the honor to suggest that Congress be asked to extend such time ten years, or until March 3, 1906, for lands patented prior to March 3, 1891, and ten years from date of patent for lands patented subsequent thereto.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not a privileged matter. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Iowa on that point.

Mr. LACEY. It is undoubtedly a privileged report from the Committee on Public Lands under paragraph 57 of Rule XI, which provides that the Committee on Public Lands shall have the privilege of reporting at any time "bills for the forfeiture of land grants in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers."

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is a bill for the reservation of the public lands for actual and bona fide settlers, lands that have been erroneously patented to somebody else. It provides means by which that erroneous patenting may be recalled and the lands may be reserved for the benefit of bona fide settlers, and it comes clearly within the paragraph of the rule I have cited.

Mr. LOUD. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this bill merely extends the time in which suits may be begun, and there is a question in my mind as to whether it does come within the provision of the rule. This is a bill which I am rather inclined to think will provoke a good deal of discussion on this floor, and the question I now raise is whether it comes within the rule as privileged. It is a bill which merely extends the time within which suits may be begun.

Mr. LACEY. I will say to the gentleman that it is a matter of great importance to his State.

Mr. LOUD. It is of great importance to my State. It opens up one of the greatest questions in California; it opens up all the old Mexican titles which we have heretofore regarded as settled. I doubt very much whether it is a privileged matter.

Mr. LACEY. It does not open up that question, Mr. Speaker; the question is now open. This bill merely amends a limitation law which is now in force, the act of 1890, and is in response to the message of the President sent here on the 17th of last month. The limitation expires on the 3d day of next month, and if there is any question about the bill being privileged there certainly should be no question about its consideration at the earliest practicable time.

Mr. LOUD. I will not object to its consideration. The question I raise is as to whether it is privileged.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, well; let it go.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair would like to understand how the bill does come within the provisions of the rule.

Mr. LACEY. In this way. The land grants have to be adjusted under the act of 1887. That act required that the Secretary of the Interior should, as speedily as possible, adjust all of these land grants and determine the lands, if any, which had been patented erroneously, such as lands lying beyond the limits of the grants. Then the act of 1891 was passed, limiting actions to cancel such patents to five years, and this bill now proposes to extend that time five years more as to everybody except bona fide settlers, so that the lands which will be affected will be lands that will be reclaimed by the United States to be reserved for the benefit of the public.

This bill, therefore, reserves for public settlement erroneously patented lands, and that brings it within the privilege of the rule. If it does not, of course the bill is not privileged. It opens the lands also to settlement, which brings it within the privilege.

Mr. LOUD. I admit that that may be contingent; but the object is simply to extend the time within which certain suits may be begun, which makes the mass of titles, which are now substantially perfected, for the next five years or more still under supervision by the Government and subject to question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that provision has always had a liberal construction, and will decide that it is a privileged matter.

Mr. LOUD. Then I raise the further point of order that this must have its further consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LACEY. It does not involve the expenditure of any public money.

Mr. LOUD. It relates to the public lands generally, however.

Mr. LACEY. It does not involve the giving away of the public lands, but the reclaiming of public lands wrongfully patented, and I do not think it is subject to that point.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman from California claim that this must go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LOUD. Because it provides ultimately for the disposition of the public lands.

The SPEAKER. In what way?

Mr. LOUD. Well, it takes land now in the possession of certain parties back to the Government, which is an ultimate disposition of the lands.

The SPEAKER. But that seems to be not an appropriation of money, but an acquisition of money.

Mr. LOUD. I am not speaking of the money portion, but that it is ultimately a disposition of the public lands, which I assume involves a question that must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOWERS. If I may be allowed a minute, as one of the committee——

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds the Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. BOWERS. Then I have nothing further to say on the subject at this time.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas to offer a substitute for the bill, so that both may be considered together.

Mr. McRAE. I offer the following as a substitute:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to repeal section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; the act entitled "An act to amend section 8 of an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," and the act entitled "An act to extend the provisions of section 8 of the act entitled 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, concerning prosecutions for cutting timber on public lands, to Wyoming, New Mexico, and Arizona," approved February 13, 1893, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the proposed substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas sounds very complex to hear it read, but is in fact a very simple matter. The act of 1891, March 3, providing a limitation against the Government in bringing suit to cancel the patents to public lands previously granted to anybody, required that all such suits should be begun within five years. This proposed substitute repeals that section without any limitation whatever, but continues the power on the part of the Government hereafter at any time to bring actions to cancel patents either to railroad companies or others for any lands that have been granted heretofore.

The committee bill, however, has been prepared with great care in response to the message of the President read to this House on the 17th day of last January. The President calls the attention of Congress to the fact that that limitation in the act of 1891 will expire on the 3d day of March, 1896, and that there are 60,000,000 acres of land grants yet to be adjusted in order to determine what patents, if any, had been erroneously issued, and asks that the law may be repealed that fixed this limitation.

The Committee on the Public Lands of the House, in response to the request of the President, prepared the bill now before the House extending the time as to these Mexican, Spanish, and railroad land grants for a period of five years. We fixed upon that time for this reason: Last year the entire force of the division of the Interior Department engaged in this work succeeded in adjusting land grants to the extent of 12,000,000 acres. There are about 60,000,000 acres of land grants yet unadjusted. The committee believe that in five years, with the same diligence shown by the Department during the last year, they could adjust all of the remaining grants. If we gave them ten years to do the work in, instead of five, the committee believe it is likely that nothing will be immediately done; but if the time was limited to five years, active work will be done, and I think that the work will all be complete within that time.

The previous adjustments of these grants have only been carried through the Department at the rate of about 3,000,000 acres a year until during the last year, when by active, diligent work, the Department succeeded in adjusting 12,000,000 acres. This bill, therefore, in the judgment of the committee, gives ample time for the conclusion of the work.

As to the settlers now on the lands, we report that the individual settlers or purchasers who have bought land from the railroad companies and other parties, and who are innocent holders of land, should not be disturbed, and that the limitation of the act of 1891 shall be absolute after the 3d day of March next.

There are in California, in Kansas, in Nebraska, and in other States very considerable quantities of these lands which have passed into the hands of innocent holders, and they are protected by the bill in its present form. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. HARTMAN. Before the gentleman does that, I want to ask him a question. I am interested in this bill, as he is, and I favor the bill. There is only one thing about it that I want to ask his judgment upon. Commencing in line 12 of page 1, and ending on line 15, page 2, the following language occurs in the bill:

But no patent to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser shall be vacated or annulled, but the right and title of such purchaser is hereby confirmed.

Now, in many instances purchasers of these lands have bought them prior to the issuance of the patent by the Government to the railroad company. I want to know whether their rights will in any way be affected by the provisions of this bill? To illustrate my point, I will say that there are now in the neighborhood of 2,000 men in the State that I represent here who are bona fide purchasers of Northern Pacific Railroad lands. They have taken them in good faith, made a partial payment, bought them on the five and ten year contract plan. They have made partial payments on those lands, and have gone into possession and made improvements. Now, what I want to know is, will their rights be entirely preserved by this bill? If not, I desire to have it amended so they will.

Mr. LACEY. It seems to me there is no question about that, as to settlers who buy the land from railroad companies having lands granted to them by acts of Congress. After the settler buys a patent is issued to the railroad company. That patent at once inures to the benefit of the purchaser, and he having bought the land and subsequently held it in good faith would be protected by the provisions of this bill. That was the intention of the bill. I think it is fully broad enough to cover it. In addition to that, sections 3 and 4 have been added, giving opportunities for the settler to have his title confirmed in the Department of the Interior. But we have in the closing words of this first section provided expressly that the title of bona fide settlers is not only protected by the limitation, but it is affirmatively confirmed by the act itself.

Mr. HARTMAN. You will observe, though, that the language says that "no patent" to any lands held by a bona fide purchaser, and so forth, shall be affected. That contemplates the previous issuance of a patent.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all.

Mr. HARTMAN. If there has been no issuance of a patent, but the railroad company have simply taken the land under the grant, and then have sold it to purchasers, and those purchasers have paid all or a portion of the purchase price, how are they protected?

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman from Montana must remember that this bill only deals with patented lands. As to the class of settlers he refers to, their rights will be determined under the forfeiture act of 1890 or any other act that may be applicable.

Mr. LACEY. The act of 1887.

Mr. McRAE. This only deals with erroneously patented lands.

Mr. LACEY. The class of settlers referred to by the gentleman from Montana is not affected one way or the other by this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to ask my colleague one question about this. There are, in the State which he and I represent in part, over 3,000,000 acres of land that might be affected by this statute. There is a provision here that the lands held by the bona fide purchaser shall not be harmfully affected, that is, so far as the annulment of the patent is concerned, but there may be a suit against every one of the holders of that land unless they do something to establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that they are bona fide owners. Will not this impose upon every one of these men the necessity of establishing that fact before the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. LACEY. No, it will not.

Mr. HEPBURN. No man will be certain until the five years have elapsed that he may not be the defendant in a suit, for he can not tell what particular patents it is the purpose of the Secretary to attempt to invalidate, and his only safety in avoiding that litigation is by himself taking the initiative to satisfy the Commissioner that he holds by a bona fide title. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, it throws the cloud that may result from the fear of litigation upon every one of these acres of land and continues it for five years.

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. The cloud is simply in the mind of my friend. We have carefully considered that question. That limitation will expire absolutely on the 3d of March. It only runs about two weeks now, and the present bill does not extend it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Their title would then be perfected?

Mr. LACEY. The title would then be perfected. It has been amply cared for, and if they desire to avail themselves directly of section 2 they may do so, or other persons can do it for them; and it is only, as I have said, to run two weeks longer.

Mr. HEPBURN. But if this law runs what would prevent the Secretary of the Interior from bringing his action for the annulment of patents of every one of these acres during any part of the limitation fixed?

Mr. LACEY. The act of 1887 and 1891 require that there shall be ninety days within which the settlers or any person against whom an action can be brought shall be notified and demand for reconveyance made, and the limitation expires in two weeks, so that it is impossible for the Government to make the demand, as the ninety days expire within two weeks. The whole matter has been carefully guarded in this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not this simply extend the provisions of an act amended relating to where another party has gone on the land afterwards?

Mr. LACEY. It does as to the original patentees, while the land remains in their possession, but where the land has been sold to an outsider or a bona fide settler the rights of the bona fide settler are protected.

Mr. HEPBURN. But how about that? Is this changed in order to prevent litigation? Is it to put a limit upon the power of the Secretary to prevent these suits, which must be done by the holder of the present title by showing to the Secretary that he is a bona fide settler?

Mr. BOWERS. His ninety-days' notification will expire before that time.

Mr. LACEY. The limitation provided in the act of 1891 expires on the 3d day of next March, and these men are protected, therefore; and the second section was drawn after consultation with gentlemen from my friend's district, where the most of these lands in Iowa are situated, and this section was put in to protect them if anything should happen between now and the 3d of March; and I am able and glad to say that the rights of the men now living in the Eighth district of Iowa have been carefully guarded by the bill.

Mr. HARTMAN. In view of the fact that there seems some question as to whether the rights of the bona fide purchasers in lands which have been patented from the railroad companies are to be protected fully here, would the gentleman have any objection to accepting an amendment to section 1 on this line, so that the last clause should read, "But the right and title of any purchaser of lands granted to any railroad company shall be, and they are hereby, confirmed to such purchasers subject to the full payment of the contract price therefor?" Would the gentleman have any objection to such an amendment as that, which eliminates all doubt?

Mr. LACEY. That raises another question that was not considered by the committee. It was not involved in our examination, and not necessarily involved in this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill only deals with patented lands. When a patent is issued for a quarter section of land held by some person whom my friend has in his mind now, under the act of 1891, and an action may hereafter be brought at any time within six years from the time at which that patent may issue, and this bill changes the time to ten years instead of six, so that this bill does not affect them in any way injuriously as to the patents hereafter to issue, but only deals with patents heretofore issued.

Mr. HARTMAN. Do you mean to say that within five years from the date it changes the time in which patents will issue in the future? How is that?

Mr. LACEY. It was proposed both ways in the committee.

Mr. HARTMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say this: If any purchaser of land for which patent has not already issued to a railroad company has made a part of his payments upon those lands, and we will say the next year patent issues, that within ten years from the date of the issuance of that patent an action can be brought against that bona fide settler?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. HARTMAN. Then I submit that you are not doing anything to protect the rights of the bona fide settlers.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman does not understand the situation.

Mr. HARTMAN. I have about 2,000 constituents who are interested in just such matter.

Mr. LACEY. Let me explain, and I think you will agree with me. The bill contemplates that in a case where a railroad company should have sold lands outside of its grant, and by mistake that land should subsequently be patented to the railroad, an action to cancel that patent will be limited to ten years; and the act of 1887 fully protects the men who are situated like those you speak of. They are entitled to a prior right in their land, and their rights are fully protected by the act of 1887. But this bill had no such purpose in view. It does not intend to confirm the title of the lands in the railroad company that may have been heretofore sold beyond the limits of its grant.

Mr. HARTMAN. Admitting that to be true, surely the gentleman does not pretend to say that the rights of a party who has bought land in good faith of a railroad company and paid his money for it, and gone on and made his improvements and expended large sums of money in that way, are protected by a bill which simply gives him a preference right to locate upon the land and buy it again from the Government?

Mr. LACEY. How could a man buy in good faith from a railroad company lands that were 40 miles, or even 3 or 4 miles, outside the limits of the grant?

Mr. HARTMAN. Oh, that is an exceptional case. That does not apply to one case in a thousand.

Mr. LACEY. Well, that is the only class of cases that will be affected by this bill. It is in the main a question of divisional lines, as to whether the grant covers the quarter section or falls short of it, and if a man bought lands before the grants were adjusted and patented, from somebody who did not own those lands, he can, under the act of 1887, procure the patents to be issued to himself, and thus be fully protected. On the other hand, in Montana a number of patents have been issued for lands that did not belong to the railroad company and which has sold them, and those purchasers are fully protected by this bill, notwithstanding the fact that the Government patented lands to the railroad company that the company was not entitled to.

I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE rose.

Mr. PICKLER. Before the gentleman from Arkansas enters into the discussion of this bill I want to ask him a question. I observe that his amendment contemplates an amendment of the timber-culture law. I want to ask him whether this bill or the substitute affe cts the timber-culture entrymen?

Mr. McRAE. It proposes to repeal section 8 of that law, not the whole law. If the gentleman will read the substitute he will see that it applies only to section 8.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, does that in any way affect timber-culture entrymen?

Mr. McRAE. Not at all. I shall not attempt, Mr. Speaker, to discuss this bill in detail. I think that in some respects it is very imperfect, even along the lines that the majority of the committee have agreed upon, but if the committee amendments are adopted it will be improved. The point to which I ask consideration of the House is this, that the statute of limitation should be repealed outright. I do not believe that there should be a statute which would prevent the Government from bringing suit to correct mistakes and frauds committed by its agents or otherwise. In 1806 there was a statute of limitation passed prohibiting suits brought on the bonds of United States marshals, and that is the only statute of limitation passed during the history of this Government until the act of March 3, 1891, which is involved in this bill, and it produced such a condition of affairs in the Department of the Interior as made it necessary to call the attention of Congress to it by a special message from the President. Now, sir, the very presence of this bill is the strongest argument than I could make for the position I assume.

It demonstrates the danger of all such legislation. It shows how easy it is to defeat justice and promote fraud when there is a statute of limitation that validates the latter. The experiment made by the Fifty-first Congress in passing the act of limitation ought to convince us that there should be none, because here we are with a large part of the railroad grants yet to be adjusted and the time fixed by that law practically out. We are urged by the Executive to act promptly, and yet on account of bonds and appropriations and other reasons it is a month before we get consideration in one branch of Congress. Millions of acres of land belonging of right to the homeless people will by reason of mistakes and frauds be lost unless we can get the concurrence of both branches and the Executive to repeal or extend the limitation against suits. The railroads want the bar to attach, and it will be hard to prevent it now.

I introduced and the last House passed a bill to repeal section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891, but no action was taken in the Senate. It may not act now. I believe that the Government, which must act through its agents, will necessarily at times have some who are incompetent, careless, or dishonest, and that it should not be bound by the doctrine of estoppel or laches like individuals who have their free volition to act at once.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time has the Government had to adjust these patents?

Mr. McRAE. Since when does the gentleman mean?

Mr. TAWNEY. Since the mistakes of the Interior Department were made. The gentleman was speaking about not holding the Government responsible.

Mr. McRAE. I do not know how many mistakes have been made. We can not tell until the adjustments are made.

Mr. TAWNEY. But mistake is the basis on which the adjustments are asked for.

Mr. McRAE. The investigation and adjustment may show that a great many mistakes have been made.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, there ought to be some limitation.

Mr. McRAE. That is the very point where the gentleman and I do not agree. I am trying in my feeble way to show that there should be no limitation.

I insist that a sovereign government which is compelled to act through its agents ought to be at liberty at any time to expose frauds perpetrated or mistakes committed by those agents. When the certification and listing of railroad lands was first inaugurated the lists were made, not because they were regarded as patents, but simply as notice to all the world that the lands were claimed by the railroad companies. These lists were oftener than otherwise prepared by the railroad companies and signed by the Department officials without much examination, under the supposition that it bound no one and that all errors could be corrected when patents were applied for.

In the course of time, however, the Land Department, which has grown and increased in importance with the years, eventually decided that these certificates made after this imperfect examination possessed the same binding force in law as patents. By the second section of this bill the certificates are treated as patents, and yet we are told that there should be a limitation against exposing and correcting the frauds that have been carried or may be carried into certificates obtained in this way. It is a dangerous policy, and will cost us much in the end. No harm can come to any honest settler who holds by purchase in good faith under the act of March 3, 1887, for by it he is secured in all of his rights. I do not object to any reasonable protection to settlers and honest purchasers, but I do not want corporations and syndicates to hide their frauds behind imaginary settlers.

My proposition is to give the President what he asks for, to give the Department what it ought to have and what it has always had until the act of 1891, and then hold them responsible for errors and frauds. If you will do this you will hold over the heads of all corrupt agents who might be induced to perpetrate a fraud the fear of exposure and punishment, but if you fix a limitation you offer a premium to corruption. Many of the sharp, shrewd representatives of railroads will be able to cover up for a limited period frauds of the greatest magnitude, and thus dishonestly take from the settlers millions of acres of land which they ought to have and could get but for the validation of such frauds by laws like the one proposed.

I think the proper thing to do is to repeal the whole limitation clause; but if you can not see your way clearly to do that, the next best thing is to pass the first section of the bill the committee recommend.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LACEY. I had an understanding with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and also with the Chair, that this bill would have been called up earlier in the day, in time to be disposed of without delaying the Agricultural appropriation bill. I only ask now that the further consideration of this bill be postponed, retaining its present status, until the Agricultural appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. LOUD. I have no objection to letting this bill go over until we dispose of the agricultural bill; but I have no disposition, in view of the fact that the Chair has already held it to be privileged, to agree that it shall retain its present status. I would not feel inclined to grant it any extraordinary privilege over and above what the bill now carries.

If it is amended to suit me, and as I have suggested to the gentleman from Iowa, by striking out these allusions to the Mexican-Spanish grants, that will be another matter.

Mr. LACEY. Well, that is a matter on which we can confer personally hereafter. I have no objection to it myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROUT). The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till the conclusion of the agricultural bill, and then to be taken up, following it immediately, retaining its present status. Is there objection?

Mr. LOUD. To the latter part of the proposition, Mr. Chairman, I must object.

Mr. LACEY. Then, objection is made, and we will have to go on with the bill.

Mr. McRAE. Would it be in order to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday or Tuesday or any other day the gentleman from Iowa may suggest? It will not lose its privilege, as I understand.

Mr. LACEY. I will make the suggestion, in view of the arrangement with the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, that the bill go over. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the Agricultural appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. LOUD. If the request of the gentleman from Iowa had been put in that language I should not have objected to it.

Mr. LACEY. I understand the gentleman from California objects.

Mr. LOUD. No; I said that I should not object to the language of the suggestion now made by the gentleman from Iowa that this bill simply go over until after the Agricultural appropriation bill is disposed of. What I do object to is the attempt that the gentleman has made to make it privileged.

Mr. LACEY. I ask also that it retain its privileged character.

Mr. LOUD. But the Chair has already decided that the bill is entitled to a privilege which would not be interfered with, I suppose, by letting it go over. The bill would be entitled to the same privilege at any other time that it is entitled to now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not understand the request. Will the Chair please state it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked for the postponement of the further consideration of the bill until the conclusion of the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and then to be immediately resumed.

Mr. LOUD. Ah, Mr. Speaker, but that was not the request, as I understand it, which the gentleman made. The motion was to postpone the bill until after the Agricultural bill was disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is conscious that he added the latter clause. The request is that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the conclusion of the Agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand the Chair to hold that the bill does not lose its privileged character?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that it loses no privilege which it now possesses. Is there objection to the request that the bill go over?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Before that motion is put, with the consent of the gentleman from New York, I desire to present a large bundle of petitions. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the petition of 8,652 Grand Army men of the State of Ohio, petitioning for a graded service-pension law, a measure which I most earnestly indorse. I simply call attention to the vast number of signers who ask this legislation, and ask that the petition take the usual course. They come to me with a favorable recommendation from the distinguished department commander of Ohio, Maj. Charles Townsend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to offer a petition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the right to introduce the petition and only asked unanimous consent to make the brief statement that I have already made.

The petitions were sent to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it was impossible to hear the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I presented a vast body of names of petitioners upon the subject of a service pension, and I simply asked permission to state that there were 8,652 of those names.

LEAVE TO PRINT ON THE BOND BILL.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the extension of the time for the printing in the RECORD of speeches upon the bill which has been under consideration (H. R. 2904) until the 22d instant, inclusive. It extends the time for one week longer. Under the agreement which was made the ten days' time would expire to-day. I desire to extend the time for one week longer, so that speeches upon that bill, within the limitations of the original agreement, may be printed in the RECORD any time during the coming week, including the RECORD of the 22d of February.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the House sufficiently understand the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and pending my motion, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate upon that bill close at 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that the general debate upon that bill be closed at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How much time does the gentleman from Georgia desire? I am willing that the debate shall go on as long as it is desired, but I simply wish to have an agreement as to the time for the general debate before we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] will not object, and I hope that nobody will interpose any objection. I think the proposition to close the general debate upon the Agricultural bill at 5 o'clock is a fair enough one. There will be plenty of time to discuss it, of course, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall be very generous in extending time.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent to close general debate on the Agricultural appropriation bill at 5 o'clock?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEELE. I thought that consent had already been given.

And then, on motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, with Mr. HULL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5161) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the time will be equally divided between the two sides. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. I have no disposition to talk on this bill. I do not know that I shall take five minutes. This is a plain, straightforward bill, the legitimate child of a company of honest farmers. [Laughter.] They have caught the spirit of the times and have sailed close to the shore. The bill carries $145,000 less than the bill of last year, and I believe that the celebrated Mr. Holman, of Indiana, was in this House at that time. His fame has gone throughout all the land, if not throughout all the world, on the matter of retrenchment.

The bill carries $234,000, practically, less than the estimates, and really $104,000 less. Now, sir, I do not know that I want to say anything more upon that. I am satisfied that you will be pleased with the bill until you come to the matter of the distribution of seeds, bulbs, and so on. It will be left in your hands, and I have no doubt you will be able to manage it to the satisfaction of men and angels.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him if there is anything in this bill which provides anything in regard to the appropriation for seeds during last year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to say to the gentleman it does not. A resolution has already passed the Senate and is now before the Committee on Agriculture on that subject, and will be reported next week. There is nothing in this bill touching the appropriation for seeds of last year. The provisions in this bill are for the fiscal year ending 1897, and that is provided for.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand the gentleman to say that the resolution passed by the Senate which instructs the Secretary of Agriculture to proceed with the distribution is now before the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is before the committee now.

Mr. PICKLER. When did I understand the gentleman to say that it will be reported?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will be reported next week.

Mr. PICKLER. I simply desire to suggest that a great many of us would be glad to see that resolution reported. Now, there is another question.

Mr. STEELE. I hope this will not come out of my time.

Mr. PICKLER. I will yield you mine. As I understand, the provision on this question in this bill is the same as the law that now exists?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. PICKLER. What assurance has the gentleman or the Committee on Agriculture that the Secretary of Agriculture, who has defied the law of the past year, that is in the same language, will not defy it the coming year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have no assurance on the subject.

Mr. PICKLER. Would it not be well to establish a parity between the law and the Secretary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. At the proper time an amendment will be offered to the section which I think will be satisfactory to the gentleman and to the House.

Mr. PICKLER. Has the gentleman the amendment already prepared?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My colleague [Mr. WILBER] has the amendment in charge.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman from New York inform me whether there is anything in this bill appropriating any money for the publication of books?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course there is the same item as of last year, on page 17, "Publications of Department of Agriculture."

Mr. QUIGG. I notice that in the past that Department has been competing with the general publishers of the country in the publication of books. I happened to notice a few days ago a publication on the "Honeybee," and I am informed by publishers that there is absolutely nothing new in it; that is simply a book that is got out by the Agricultural Department, in competition with books that are published on that subject, as other books have been got out by the Agricultural Department in competition with the regular publishers of the country; and it occurred to me that in this era of retrenchment, upon which we are all on both sides of the House agreed, it might be a good idea for the gentleman and his committee, who have already economized so admirably, if they would extend their economy to the publication department of the Agricultural Department and enable the publishers of the country to sell their books without the cheap-labor competition of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The gentleman from Montana is authority for the statement that efforts are now being made to cross the honeybee with the lightning bug, in order that the product may labor at night. I want to know if there is an appropriation here for that purpose or if the committee has taken that into consideration? [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would not require an appropriation, Mr. Chairman. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York to control one-half of the time and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to control the other half.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in any general debate on this bill. The bill is a very good one, a very economical one in every respect, and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the House. When we come to the proper point in the debate under the five-minute rule I shall want to propose perhaps an amendment or two.

I will now yield fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I propose at the proper time to introduce an amendment to this bill which has reference to the sale and introduction of tobacco and other farm products in foreign countries. I will say now what I have to say upon that amendment, and also upon some other matters connected with the general bill.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because in my judgment it has reference to a matter which has received little or no consideration. Not because it is of little importance, but because it is not generally understood. My amendment may apply to other farm products, but it is my purpose to confine myself for the few moments I have to speak to the one product, tobacco. No other product of the greatest and most important of all industries is so trammeled in its efforts to reach and supply the foreign demands.

England and Germany are free markets and offer to the American farmer an opportunity to sell this great staple without let or hindrance, and afford by far the best outlet for the surplus, especially for certain grades of tobacco. Nearly all the strips (that is, leaves with the stems taken out) made in this country are sold in England, and a considerable quantity of rich, dark tobacco is sent to Germany. This still leaves a very large proportion of the crop not needed in this country to seek other markets, or, I might rather say, to be sought by Government contractors to supply the demands of other foreign countries. The Governments of France, Italy, and Spain, and probably some others, buy entirely through what is termed "Regie" contracts. These contracts are let to individuals and firms, they agreeing to furnish so many hogsheads of the particular types wanted at a stipulated price. The entire trade is a government monopoly. Austria and Hungary buy through their consuls, but the monopoly is the same.

Now, my object in offering these amendments is to try to open these foreign markets to the individual producers of tobacco in this country. In France and these other countries no individual is permitted to sell a hogshead of tobacco at all. Tobacco is treated differently in that respect from any other product, and this great industry is a very important one to a large part of the people of this country. These contracts are made with a few individuals. These individuals set the price of the product in this country, and it must go into their hands, because there is no outlet for it except through these contractors.

The contractors are few in number—generally three or four men control the contracts for these Governments—and of course with an abundant supply they get together and fix the price on all export grades, from which there is no appeal, as all this tobacco must go into this trade or it can not be sold at all.

Now, the object of this amendment is to start an investigation of this matter and by friendly intercourse with these Governments seek in time to get them, for advantages offered them in the sale of their products to this country, to at least modify this method of supplying their wants, so as to allow our dealers in tobacco, or our farmers, if they think proper to do so, to ship and sell tobacco in these countries as freely as other products are sold, under such customs duties or restrictions as they may see proper to impose. England puts a very high tariff on tobacco; still it is our best market for certain grades.

That this may not appear to be a trivial matter, I desire to present a few figures to show the importance of this crop, at least to Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, and especially to Kentucky, as that State produces about one-half of the tobacco grown in the United States.

For the year 1895:

Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Louisville	174,885
Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Cincinnati*	30,000
Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Hopkinsville*	15,000
Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Clarksville*	15,000
Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Paducah*	12,000
Number of hogsheads of Kentucky tobacco sold at Mayfield*	5,000
Estimated bought loose and not resold in any of these markets	20,000
Total	271,885

*Estimated.

At 1,400 pounds to the hogshead equals 380,639,000 pounds.

I am unable to state accurately the amount of "Regie" tobacco taken from Ohio, Maryland, and Virginia, but state approximately as the amount taken of Western tobacco, mostly from Kentucky and Tennessee.

	Hogsheads.
France (annually)	10,000
Italy (annually)	18,000
Spain (annually)	16,000
Hungary and Austria (annually, through their consuls)	6,000

Making as a total 70,000,000 pounds, or 50,000 hogsheads.

Under Government monopoly this tobacco is sold at enormous profits, ranging from 200 to 800 per cent, France, for instance, realizing upon this article alone a revenue of many times its cost in this country, amounting annually from sixty to seventy millions of dollars. England does the same thing by a different method; not shutting off private shipments and sales, but by an enormous tariff of 76 cents per pound. This is at least ten times the cost of the tobacco in this country. It may be retorted that our tariff on tobacco is very high. On fine cigar wrappers it is $1.50 to $2.25 per pound, and lower grades 35 to 50 cents per pound; but when we come to compare the real market value of these tobaccos it will be seen that our seemingly high tariff sinks into insignificance when compared with the enormous duty imposed by England, our rate being from 73 to 198 per cent of the value, England's ten times the cost, or 1,000 per cent. Of course open markets on the one hand and a lower duty on the other would greatly increase the demand by lowering the price to consumers, and correspondingly increasing the price to producers in this country.

The provisions of this amendment kindly, gradually, but persistently carried to a successful issue would, in my judgment, bring greater benefits to the producers of this important farm product than all the legislation ever enacted in its interest.

The importance of the improvement of agriculture in methods of sale, of culture, and of prices for products can not be exaggerated. It is the basis of all industries. It furnishes three-fourths of all our exports. Upon its broad and stalwart shoulders rest the most vital interests of every class, of every calling, and, indeed, of every individual citizen of this great country. Without agriculture we could have no commerce, and of course would have no use for railroads or banks or other great institutions, which, under the benign influence and fostering care of a prosperous agriculture, are capable of bringing such great benefits and blessings to the human race. These things being true, it can not be said that any legislation which fosters and benefits agriculture is in any sense class legislation. Washington said: "No greater good could come to any country than the improvement of its agriculture."

Other causes, at least in the judgment of the farmers themselves, have a most pernicious effect upon the price of farm products—one is the unsatisfactory financial system which prevails in this country at this time. No one seems to be satisfied with the present system, and no one seems capable of suggesting a better which would be acceptable to all sections or, in fact, to either party. One party imposing additional burdens upon the people by a continuous bond system, the end of which no human foresight can determine; the other party doing the same thing by additional tariff taxation under the guise of providing an increase of revenue, which the disbursing agents of the Government declare we do not need.

What is the result of the exhaustive discussion of this great question which has occupied the House for the past several days? Any conclusion reached? Any practical plan for a new or different financial system proposed? Certainly none which at all promised the possibility of being enacted into law or satisfying even in an approximate degree the great mass of the people.

The two great political parties of the country stand disaffected and divided with folded arms, unable or unwilling to manifest that degree of patriotism or love of humanity which should induce every wellwisher for the real prosperity of the country to sacrifice at least something of personal opinion and agree to some plan which would bring relief to that great industry which, prosperous itself, can alone bring prosperity to the country at large.

We can speak with pride of our manufactories, our railroads, our commerce, our exports, three-fourths of which, as I have said, are furnished by agriculture; but all these great industries must languish and become unproductive unless the basal industry upon which they all rest is by some means rehabilitated and made more remunerative to the tillers of the soil.

This depression is not only felt in this country, but in others as well. The Queen of England, in her recent address to the Parliament, said:

> I regret to say that the condition of husbandry is disastrous beyond any recent experience. Measures will be laid before you with the object to mitigate the distress in that industry.

It is easy to find fault, and it is said that farmers are proficient in this particular recreation. Whether these complaints are real (as we believe many of them are) or imaginary, the same effect of unrest and dissatisfaction is produced, and this great conservative class, amounting to about 30,000,000 of our population, have their eyes of hope turned to this Congress, with its overwhelming Republican majority, in mute appeal for relief. They have "asked bread, will you continue to give them a stone?"

Another prolific source of complaint is the gambling in farm products, by which it is made to appear that there is for sale, and is sold, one thousand times as much of any stipulated product as has been raised. However, it is not my purpose to discuss this subject now, as a bill will probably soon be before this Congress seeking to remedy this evil.

In conclusion, I desire to say, as a real representative of the American farmer, and without the slightest prejudice to other callings and professions, all of which are needed and have an important place to fill in this busy world of ours. Real farmers, men of worth and integrity, and a proper understanding of the situation, should not and will not ask any character of legislation which might be supposed to benefit them at the expense or detriment of other classes of citizens. This amendment offered to this bill suggests the route through which good to this great interest may come. It is impossible, under any system of protection, that the staple agricultural products of this country, which are produced largely in excess of our own needs, can be benefited or in any way protected against competition of other countries or the low prices of other markets of the world. The system of bounties proposed by some to be laid upon exports of agricultural products would, in my judgment, be fraught with far more evil than good. It is wrong in principle, and would be impracticable in execution, only bringing, it may be, benefits to the few to the detriment of the many. We ask no legislation of this kind, but come modestly and say, only give us a fair chance. Take away the obstructions as far as it can be done by friendly conference and agreement with other countries; open to us, as wide as may be, the avenues of commerce; give us open and unobstructed markets at home and abroad, and, aided by other reforms already indicated, we can and will successfully compete with the world.

With the best country on the globe, the best farm machinery, and the best and most effective workers in the world, why should we fear competition with any other country or people on earth? [Applause.]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before my colleague takes his seat, I would like to ask him to have the amendment which he proposes to offer read.

Mr. CLARDY. I will read it. It is this:

> Page 9, after line 6, insert the following:
> "And to secure as far as may be a change in the methods of supplying tobacco and other farm products to foreign countries."

It will be seen that this does not add anything to the amount of the appropriation made by the bill, but simply enlarges the scope of the action to be taken by the Secretary in introducing our products into foreign countries.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. You referred in your speech to the quantity of tobacco produced in Kentucky; was your reference to the product of last year?

Mr. CLARDY. Yes; 1895.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose at this time to indulge in any strictures upon the present Secretary of Agriculture, but rather to give a brief and succinct statement of the seed question. For something more than thirty years it has been the policy of this Government to distribute seeds among the farmers of the United States, to make, as the present Secretary puts it, a "free, promiscuous distribution of seeds." In the appropriation act for the year 1866, under the head "Department of Agriculture" we find this language:

> For purchase of cereal, vegetable, and flower seeds, and for labor in putting up seeds, seed bags, and miscellaneous items, $60,000: Provided, That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall only purchase and distribute, with the fund herein appropriated for that purpose, such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another.

Prior to that time there had been distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture, but this, I believe, was the first limitation put upon the Commissioner of Agriculture in regard to the expenditure of the money appropriated for that purpose. That provision, somewhat elaborated, became section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which is in the following language:

> The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase, or propagation and distribution, of seeds, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interest of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the provisions of law upon that subject found outside of the necessary provisions of the appropriation bills. I heartily agree that it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture in the purchase and distribution of seeds to conform to section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which I have just read, and

I believe there is no condition of affairs existing in the United States which makes it impossible, or even difficult, for him to execute and expend the appropriation under that section of the Revised Statutes. To show something of the purpose of Congress and to show the view which members of Congress took of this subject in times that have passed, I send to the desk, to be read by the Clerk, an extract from the speech of Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, delivered in the House of Representatives on the 8th day of April, 1876.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is, perhaps, not universally known that the country suffers more from worn-out seeds than worn-out land. When a field is partly seeded with oats received from the Department weighing 50 pounds to the bushel and partly with the best common oats that could be procured weighing 37 pounds to the bushel, and when the heavier oats produced 65 bushels an acre weighing 48 pounds to the bushel and the lighter oats produced 48 bushels an acre weighing 31 pounds to the bushel, it is time every farmer should know what is meant by worn-out seed, the percentage of annual deterioration, and the necessity of periodical renewal, where the best seed can be had, and what sections of our country are best adapted to this and other crops.

Individual effort can not supply this want. No journal in the land furnishes a tithe of the information respecting the monthly condition of crops in all the States and foreign countries.

About one-half of our people are engaged in agricultural pursuits. This is the only Department of the Government that interests one-half of our people directly. The States can not supply the information for themselves, for while each State could very readily arrive at a knowledge of the condition of all its industries, such knowledge is comparatively valueless without like information respecting all the others.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. After Mr. Wilson had spoken those words he went on to give individual instances where the Department of Agriculture had distributed seed which had proved immensely valuable to farmers. And right here, let me say proudly, Mr. Chairman, that I was myself a farmer's boy, brought up on a farm, and doing farm work with my own hands, and I know that in those boyhood days we always looked forward with interest to the time when our Congressman should send us seeds, and I know that we found in actual practice that we could use those he did send with great profit. I may add that in my own neighborhood very many of the finest kinds of vegetables that were produced were raised from the seeds thus distributed, and such is the fact down to this day in that locality. Even during the last summer I received very many thanks for seed which I had myself distributed.

I now ask your attention while I read an extract from the report of Mr. King, who was in charge of the seed division of the Agricultural Department in 1888. He says:

It is the aim of the Department to distribute enough seed to thoroughly test each valuable variety of wheat, corn, barley, oats, or other cereal, in every Congressional district in which it is probable that they can be successfully grown. The increased production per acre, and the greater weight per bushel of a superior quality that has resulted from the distribution by the Department would, if the facts could be aggregated, convince the most skeptical of its value to the country at large. The value of the seed distribution is best evidenced by the records in the annual reports of the Department. For instance, in that of 1868 it is shown that the wheat crop reached 224,036,600 bushels; acreage, 18,460,132; average yield per acre, 12.1 bushels; value of crop, $319,195,290; average price per bushel, $1.42.

The reports of experiments with Tappahannock wheat distributed by the Department show an average yield per acre of 25 bushels; the total yield at that rate, on the acreage of 1868, would be 461,503,300 bushels, an increase of 237,466,700 bushels, which at $1.42 per bushel would be a money-value increase of $337,202,714. If this wheat were to take the place of other varieties, however, and should be sown as the general crop is now sown, without the special care usual in experimenting, the average yield would, of course, fall below 25 bushels; but if the average increase per acre could be raised to 15 bushels (a low estimate for the Tappahannock) the increase in bushels would be 55,380,396; in money value, $78,640,162.

Immediately after the introduction of the Fultz wheat in 1871 into nearly every county of Virginia, from 40 experiments in nearly as many counties, the lowest yield reported was 15 bushels to the acre, while the average yield was 30 bushels. The average yield of the wheat crop in Virginia in 1871 was 8 bushels per acre, and the price was $1.39 per bushel, making a total valuation of $8,852,910. If the Fultz wheat had been exclusively sown and the average yield had been but 15 bushels per acre, a gain of only 7 bushels, the resulting increase of the value of the wheat crop would have been $7,746,896, or about one-quarter enough to pay the existing State debt. As the direct result of the very general distribution of improved varieties the increase in the average yield of wheat during the years 1878, 1879, and 1880 was 2 bushels per acre. This in 40,000,000 acreage yearly would be 80,000,000 bushels increase, or a gain to the country of about $75,000,000 annually.

All that started from a distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture. Again he says:

The increase in yield of oats by the introduction of improved varieties imported or grown in localities especially adapted to their growth has been from 10 to 30 bushels per acre, sufficient to pay the entire cost of growing the crop, thus leaving the usual average crop one of clear gain to the producer.

Again I quote from this report:

The direct benefits resulting from the distribution of Department seeds would, if aggregated, represent more millions than the seed has ever cost in thousands in any year of its existence. Wherever a marked increase of crops has occurred the result has generally been attributed to the new and improved varieties of seed distributed. The statement is frequently made by correspondents that the seed received by them had increased the yield of crops from 10 to 50 per cent. The records of the Department teem with evidences of the money value of the increased production due to the introduction of new seeds.

Many indirect factors of great general value can also be secured by a study of results of seed distribution. The benefits obtained from a mere change of seed from one climate to another, or from one kind of soil to another, are sometimes very marked. The records of the Department show that on farms where the wheat crop, from an average of 24 bushels per acre, has been gradually diminished to 20 bushels or less per acre, a change of seed again ran up the crop to its former average maximum yield, thus indicating that a diminishing production is not always attributable to soil deterioration alone, and that a systematic rotation of seed exchange is a potent factor in maintaining the productive capacity of the soil.

Not the least of the benefits resulting from the introduction of new varieties of seed is the mixed and varied husbandry made possible thereby. In no Department of the General Government has the expenditure of so small a sum been productive of as much good as that expended in the introduction and dissemination of valuable seeds and plants.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read that last paragraph again?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

In no Department of the General Government has the expenditure of so small a sum been productive of as much good as that expended in the introduction and dissemination of valuable seeds and plants.

Mr. STEELE. What report is that?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It is in the report for 1888, the report of Mr. King, who was then in charge of the seed distribution and had held that position under several Commissioners and the first Secretary of the Department.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the unvarying testimony of all who have had to do with this question until we come down to the year 1894. In the message and documents relating to the Department for that year we find a report of the special agent for the purchase of seed. We shall have occasion to refer to him more than once before we get done with this bill.

Mr. Enos S. Harnden, the special agent for the purchase of seed, says:

In the light of my experience as a former seed man, however, I consider the free distribution of seeds by this Department as an infringement upon and an interference with a legitimate business, and I believe it should be abolished.

This gentleman claims that he was a seedsman himself and that it interfered with his former business. His impression was that the distribution should be abolished, and that no further distribution of seed should take place to the citizens of the United States. That view either he transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Agriculture transferred it to him, for it seems to have become a settled policy of the Department. Which it was I do not know, but I think I am not transcending my duty as a member of the Committee on Agriculture in the last Congress when I say that there was a determined effort made before that committee to get it not to recommend the usual seed appropriation.

The Department of Agriculture was heard before that committee as much as it desired to be heard, and when we decided to report the bill appropriating money for the purchase of seeds I believe there was not a dissenting vote in the committee. It came into the House, and probably not more than half a dozen Representatives opposed the appropriation. I have been told upon good authority that a like condition of unanimity existed in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, and that there was no opposition in the Senate to the passage of the usual appropriation bill. Therefore, up to last summer, there had been no adverse action taken, either in a legal or an illegal way, in connection with the purchase of seeds.

But we find from the Secretary's own report that he was determined, if possible, not to execute the appropriation which Congress had made. And so, first of all, hoping to secure some kind of sanction for his intended action, he asked the Attorney-General to construe for him the law, especially the section of the Revised Statutes which I have read. In reply, the Attorney-General, the present Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, repeating the interrogatories submitted, says:

You make two inquiries, as follows:

"Can the Secretary of Agriculture legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to wit, seeds 'rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent change from one part of our own country to another,' under authority of the act of March 2, 1895?

"Would it be proper and lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture, in view of the verbiage of the act of March 2, 1895, and the wording of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to advertise for proposals to furnish the Department of Agriculture seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants, 'rare and uncommon to the country, and for such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another,' reserving the right to reject any and all bids?"

The answer is:

1. The seeds purchasable under the act of March 2, 1895, are limited to those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, there being no reasonable ground for claiming that the act of March 2, 1895, operates, or was intended to operate, as a repeal of the earlier statute.

2. If not obligatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, trees, etc., conformably to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is certainly competent for him to make the purchases comformably to said statute, the right to reject any and all bids being reserved. But the form of the question is such that I think it proper to call attention to the fact that, while seeds purchased must be such as are "rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," the trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings to be purchased are such "as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States."

Respectfully, yours,

RICHARD OLNEY, Attorney-General.

I do not suppose there is a lawyer in the United States of America who would have given a different answer. I do not suppose there is a Representative in the sound of my voice who would have wished the Secretary of Agriculture to have made his purchases in any other way than as was required by section 527 of the Revised Statutes.

Can anyone find in that answer of the Attorney-General any liberty or license to the Secretary of Agriculture not to carry out the appropriation? There is not a solitary word in it which indicates any such suggestion, but its whole tenor and statement is that it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out that appropriation and to do it conformably to law. Now, let us see how the Secretary of Agriculture proposed to do it. The Attorney-General replied to him April 20. On April 27 he issued proposals in the following language:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1895.

In accordance with section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which authorizes the purchase of "seeds rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," also "such trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings as are adapted to general cultivation, and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States," and in accordance with the terms of the appropriation (act approved March 2, 1895) for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, "as required by law," sealed proposals, in duplicate, subject to the usual conditions, will be received by the Secretary of Agriculture until 2 p. m., July 1, 1895, for supplying to the United States Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and to be delivered before November 1, 1895, such valuable seeds, trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, as are covered by section 527 of the Revised Statutes quoted above. Persons submitting bids should specify the kind and varieties, with full description of each variety, of seeds and plants upon which they desire to submit bids and the quantities they are prepared to contract for, and must guarantee delivery of the same in Washington. The right is reserved to reject any or all bids.

J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary.

It is to be observed from this proposal that the Secretary of Agriculture—although it is presumed he had given great attention to this subject—was not willing to specify in the proposals what he wanted, either in kind, variety, or quantity, and the subsequent correspondence, which is contained in Senate Document No. 40 of this Congress, shows that he received very many letters asking for information, and in no case did he send a letter in reply, but according to this very document, sent simply the advertisement again.

Again, it is shown by the correspondence that the Secretary was informed that it would be impossible, if he was to have seeds of that year's production, to cure them sufficiently to be delivered in bulk at the Department by the 1st of November, and he was asked if, in regard to those particular varieties, he would not be willing to give additional time. In no instance did he make a direct and satisfactory reply to that inquiry. The general reply was another copy of the advertisement. How, then, could the seedsmen throughout this country know what the Secretary of Agriculture wanted or what he was willing to do? More than that, it has been told to me—I do not know accurately of the truth of it—that certain seedsmen were confidentially informed by employees of the Department of Agriculture that it would be useless for them to bid, because no seeds were to be bought.

I ask that you give this document your full and careful consideration, because you will find in it from beginning to end a thorough, determined purpose not to execute the statute of the United States, not to buy the seeds, not to conform to the custom and practice of his predecessors or to his own. More than that, this document shows that if a bid was a little irregular in form it was rejected for that reason only. If it was received a minute too late it was rejected. And in every instance after the time for the opening of the bids each person asking information was informed that there would be no seed distribution that year.

Mr. BOATNER. I want to ask the gentleman how he expects, if the verdict of the Secretary is the same as last year, that the Secretary of Agriculture will execute the law? He has refused to expend the former appropriation or obey the provision directing the expenditure of this money, and he claims to be supported in that position by the decision of the Attorney-General.

Now, if the committee merely reenacts the law of last year, what reason is there to expect that the Secretary of Agriculture will make the expenditure and distribution to which the gentleman is addressing himself?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In the first place, in reply to the gentleman from Louisiana, I wish to repeat what I have already said, that there is nothing in the opinion of the Attorney-General to justify the nonaction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he, as a lawyer, if he will examine it, will agree with me in that statement; secondly——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In a moment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask him one question right now. It will be too late afterwards.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then, again, it is impossible to tell what may transpire between now and the time for the execution of the next appropriation bill. There may be such object lessons as will lead him to abandon his office or to execute the law.

I find, also, that he appointed to open these bids and to pass upon them this same Enos S. Harnden, who had announced that he was the "late seedsman," and that he was opposed to the purchase of any seed whatever. That he appointed, as second, the disbursing officer, and the third of that committee a clerk in his immediate office. That committee opened the bids at the time designated, and in a very few days after that they reported that they had rejected them all; and appended to the bids, as printed in this document, there appears simply a memorandum of the ground upon which they rejected them, viz, "that they were not rare or uncommon." And yet the Secretary, in his statement before the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, claimed that some of them were "so rare and uncommon" in relation to their prices that it would not be expedient to buy them. Then, upon that report, we find that on the 25th day of July he abolished the seed division and closed the door, so far as it was possible for him to do so, to any further purchase of seeds.

Mr. PICKLER. What was the date that he closed the seed division?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The 25th day of July.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield the gentleman twenty minutes more.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Then he directed the seed division of his Department to be closed, a division which had been regularly appropriated for by Congress, and he discharged the people who had been appropriated for and occupied the space which that division had previously occupied by other divisions of his office which were more in favor with him.

Mr. PICKLER. What was the date, now, that the bids were opened and the seed division closed?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The bids were opened on the 6th day of July and the seed division was closed on the 25th of that month.

Mr. PICKLER. And they did not need any of those seeds until November to give to us?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Really not until January of the next year.

And now comes the next question which immediately arises in all your minds. If the bids which were opened on the 1st day of July were not satisfactory, if they did not conform to the statutes, if they were not sufficient in number, if they were too high in price, or if there was anything else the matter with them, why did not he issue proposals again? There was time for half a dozen proposals to be made, for the bids to be put in, and the seeds to be delivered before the time of the ordinary delivery, on the 10th of January of the next year, to Congressmen and Senators for their distribution. It was simply and solely that he did not desire to do it; and that, acting as Secretary of Agriculture, he preferred to nullify an act of Congress rather than to perform his sworn duty. There is no escape from that conclusion.

Now, there are a few matters to which I wish to ask your attention, which seem to come so directly from the Secretary himself that they show his animus in this matter. It was my privilege to offer a resolution in this House on the 6th of December last, upon this very seed question, calling upon the Secretary of Agriculture for his reasons for nonaction. The resolution was objected to by the gentleman from Tennessee, and consequently under our rules went to the Committee on Agriculture without action by the House. But a like resolution was a day or two afterwards passed in the Senate, and in reply to this resolution the document to which I have already referred was sent. But very soon after I offered that resolution the Secretary had a long interview with a reporter of the Evening Star, which can be found in the issue of Saturday, December 21, 1895, in which he is asked in regard to this matter; and some of the language he is reported to have used on that occasion is so peculiar for a Secretary of a Department that I beg the indulgence of the House while I read it.

Turning to matters more personal to the Secretary's Department, I asked him about the resolution of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire to investigate the seed question. The Secretary settled back in his chair, with a smile.

"I am quite ready for them on that question," he said. "But there may be a good Republican or two on the anxious seat."

And now please observe this language:

When I began to investigate the sale of seeds by members of Congress I sent the purchasing agent of the seed bureau to the Capitol, with instructions to buy the seed quota of some member of the House and give his check for it.

Admitting that it would be culpable on the part of any member of Congress to sell his seed quota, what shall we say of a Secretary who sent his own trusted official, probably with the Government's money, to the Capitol to degrade and debauch a member or members of Congress?

Mr. MEREDITH. Is that member's name given in any way? It ought to be given.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It is not.

Mr. MEREDITH. I would vote for a resolution to compel his name to be given.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire (reading):

He had no difficulty in finding a seller of seeds among Congressmen, and in my possession now is the check bearing the indorsement of a millionaire ex-member of the House—a check for $75. I have kept the man's name out of my annual report, and he is not mad about that. I have no wish to do him any injury. I was not after him personally, but after the system of which he has become an "awful example."

If the House investigates the seed question of course the ex-member's name may have to be made public. There also will be shown about a hundred transfers of seeds from one member to another recorded on the books of the Department. They do not prove, of course, that money was paid for the transfers. I suppose the members will say they exchanged public documents for seed, and vice versa. One of the friends of this seed-selling millionaire said the $75 had been used to buy copies of the horse book for gratuitous circulation. Again, I am told that he bought $75 worth of pocket knives for presentation to the pages of the House. They had better harmonize their stories for the defense, else the matter, becoming public, would embarrass the defendant by adverse or antagonistic pleadings.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there, according to his own contention, in that interview is a condition of affairs which I presume never did exist before in this country.

Mr. KEM. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. If it would be proper, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows who this man is he purchased this seed from?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not.

Mr. MEREDITH. I hope my friend will call for his name.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He is an ex-member, and would be beyond the jurisdiction of this House.

Mr. KEM. It seems to me that it would relieve a good many members of this House from suspicion, because there are a number of us who were members of the last House.

Mr. MOSES. Would they take you for a millionaire? [Laughter.]

Mr. KEM. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that I am not a millionaire; but there are a great many people in this country who may suspect that I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, let me repeat, Mr. Chairman, that here is a peculiar condition of affairs, one which probably never before existed in the United States, certainly one which was never before brought to the attention of an American Congress, that a Secretary of one of the Executive Departments of the Government has, by his own admission, attempted to seduce and reduce to degradation a member of the Legislature of the nation. If Mr. Morton can explain that satisfactorily, I hope he will; for, as I said before, I am not here to vituperate against him. I am here simply to defend the purchase of seeds and to explain the circumstances which surround and justify it. But the Secretary has gone a little bit further than that. He seems to be ready, not only to purchase the seeds of members of Congress and pay for them and then turn State's evidence and claim glory for it, but he stands ready also to defy Congress, according to his own statement.

I find in the Washington Post of February 9, 1896, another interview—and, by the way, this Secretary is great upon being interviewed—from which I read this language:

Under the law, continued the Secretary, every head of an Executive Department, when he is in doubt as to the meaning of a statute, is required to apply to the Attorney-General for advice, and it was upon the opinion of Mr. Olney that I based my action. There is one way for them [referring to Congress] to satisfy their minds as to whether I have violated the law, and that is to bring articles of impeachment against me. If I have deliberately violated the law, I should be impeached—

I agree with him—and the sooner they go at it the better. If they can not impeach me, then they can not substantiate their statements. If I am wrong, I am ready to take the consequences.

So, Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with this condition of affairs. The Congress of the United States has made an appropriation and has expressed its will time and time again as to the expenditure of that appropriation; one branch of Congress has passed a resolution demanding that the Secretary of Agriculture carry out that appropriation according to the law and the uniform practice, which resolution is now before a committee of this House and, I am told, will soon be reported to this body for its action. If, in the opinion of the members of this House, the Secretary of Agriculture is right, of course they will not pass the resolution. If, on the contrary, they believe, as I most certainly do, that he is absolutely and unconditionally wrong, and that the seed question is of very small consequence in comparison with the right settlement of the question which the Secretary raises when he lays down the proposition that, he being the head of an Executive Department, it rests in his own sweet will either to execute or not execute an appropriation made by Congress, and that, too, when he does not even claim that the appropriation is unconstitutional or that it is contrary to the practice of the Government. If Representatives believe as I do about that I trust they will take appropriate action.

Mr. SWANSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. Did not the Secretary recommend to Congress not to make the appropriation for seeds? Did not the House of Representatives refuse to follow his recommendation and make the appropriation, and then, in complete violation of the recommendation he had previously made, did he not fail to use that appropriation after the will of this body and of the other branch of Congress on the subject had been ascertained?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. All that is true. His recommendations went to and were considered by the Committee on Agriculture of this House in the last Congress and to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate in the same Congress, and I presume he has made a like recommendation in this Congress; but as to that I do not know.

Now, as I have said, the question of seeds is of comparatively small importance, although I believe it to be important and one that the people of this country require action upon at our hands; but the great and overpowering question of all in this case is: Shall we, as the representatives of the people, permit the head of any Executive Department to disregard and, so far as is within his power, to nullify acts of Congress which we pass, and shall he go unscathed? That is the question before the House which we must meet in behalf of the people, that we may preserve our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I believe there are thirty-five minutes still remaining to this side of the committee. Of that time, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES], ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I shall use but little of the time which has been accorded me as a member of the committee, as there are other gentlemen who wish to be heard. I have been a member of the Agricultural Committee since 1891, and I believe that the present is the smallest Agricultural appropriation we have had during that time. This is called an appropriation for the Agricultural Department, but the money which it carries is largely used for other purposes not strictly agricultural.

For instance, nearly one-third of the entire amount, or more than $800,000, goes to the Weather Bureau. Not one of the Republican members of the committee has deemed it necessary to say anything about this bill or to give any indication that they believed the farmers of the country expect them to say anything in behalf of their interests. They are ready at all times to advocate bonds and tariff and protection for the classes, but for the interests of the plain people of the country they display no concern.

The bill before us appropriates $130.000 for the purchase of valuable seeds, plants, and the like, to be distributed among the people of the entire country. This has been the law for twenty years, and this amount was carried in the last bill.

I remember that in the Fifty-third Congress the Secretary of the Agricultural Department urged our committee to strike out this appropriation. We refused to concur with him. The matter was brought before this House and fully discussed. After hearing all that could be said by his friends both Houses almost unanimously directed that no change be made. Mr. Chairman, in this country it is the duty of the Congress to make the laws, and it is the duty of the Executive Departments to see that they are carried into effect, and not to nullify or abrogate them. If the Secretary of Agriculture was in doubt before as to the legislative will and intention, he certainly was not after the discussion had here.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion just there?

Mr. MOSES. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to ask if the gentleman remembers the fact that the House increased the appropriation $30,000 for this very purpose?

Mr. MOSES. That is true. I offered the amendment myself in the committee. It was at first proposed to give only $100,000, and it was afterwards increased to $130,000, and $30,000 additional for the distribution of bulletins. We kept the same amount for seed distribution and did not cut it down one iota.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of this House to the growing tendency upon the part of the executive branch of this Government to ignore the laws of the land. Thwarted in his efforts to take this poor pittance from the farmers, he assumes the veto power and says the law shall not be enforced. No throne in constitutional Europe has such power. After a bill is passed in this and the other end of the Capitol and signed, these despots who sit in official positions in Washington, who, by the way, are never elected by the popular vote of the people, must sit in judgment upon our acts and say what shall and what shall not be the law of the land. [Applause.] And this is especially true when it is anything affecting the agricultural classes.

I charge here that the laws of the country are often nullified, and more frequently misconstrued against the people's interest. I warn you that here lies the greatest danger to our country. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARDY] was yesterday denouncing the old nullifiers of South Carolina. Why, sir, Calhoun and his followers pale into insignificance compared with these. [Laughter.] The law says that sufficient silver shall be coined to redeem the Sherman notes. The Executive says gold shall be the only redemption money. In the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses we directed that a small sum be expended in testing the feasibility of extending better mail facilities to the rural districts. They refuse to do so.

Mr. Chairman, these few packages of seeds are about all the farmers of the country really get from the Government; everybody else gets protection. We appropriate $450,000,000 a year of the people's money, and though one-half of the people of the country are farmers, we can not give them this pitiful sum. As Senator VEST said, we can give thousands to raise rare flowers for the powers that be, but we must take from the poor man this small pittance that helped to feed his family.

Mr. Chairman, the danger to democratic institutions of the United States is not so much that the people's representatives will not do their duty as that those usurping powers, having no consideration for the welfare of the people, will nullify their will and will not carry out the laws which have been passed.

The Secretary of Agriculture said with reference to the seed distribution that the system was objectionable because some member has seen fit to sell his portion of the seed. I do not believe that any member of Congress would do such a thing as that. I believe his name, if signed to any such transaction as that, was forged.

Understand that I do not charge the Secretary with willful misrepresentation of the members of this House. I believe he has been deceived or imposed upon. I do not challenge the word of the Secretary of Agriculture; but I do say, Mr. Chairman, that there has certainly been a mistake somewhere. I know city members who, having no use for their pro rata, have generously donated them to the other members. A member from Baltimore, in the Fifty-second Congress, came to me and voluntarily, as I was a country member, gave me a part of his apportionment of seeds. I noticed, too, that many of the seed went to gentlemen residing in the Secretary's own State, and I do not believe that they bought one package of the seeds that were transferred to them.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] asks why we have not changed the law. He asks why we did not make it mandatory. We have not done so because we know if we put anything of that nature into the bill that would change existing law, some "cuckoo," ever ready, would sound his note and raise the point of order against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. There is no rule of the House now that prohibits a change of existing law in appropriation bills, is there?

Mr. MOSES. We can not change existing law in appropriation bills.

Mr. BOATNER. It was not so in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. Your claim is that under the existing law the seeds should be distributed, is it not?

Mr. TUCKER. Under the present law.

Mr. MOSES. Under the present law. He says there are no valuable seeds, and I say this——

Mr. HOPKINS. It would be no innovation to add a paragraph giving an explanation to that law, so that even the Secretary of Agriculture could understand it.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary openly defies Congress and tells us to impeach him. Something like this should have been done long ago. The old Democratic ship will never ride the political seas safely until these Jonahs are cast overboard.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, the feature of this question which has aroused my indignation is the fact that the refusal of the Secretary of Agriculture to expend the appropriation made by the last Congress for the purchase and distribution of seeds is based upon a sort of false pretense.

Antecedent to his decision that under the terms of the law he was not authorized to expend the appropriation, there emanated from the Agricultural Department reports derogatory and discrediting to the Congress of the United States.

The individual who has found his way into the Agricultural Department under this Administration (laughter) considered it not inconsistent with the dignity of his position to allow reports to go out through the press, scattered broadcast through the Union, that he had discovered great frauds and abuses in the distribution by members of the seeds allotted to them under existing laws, and whose names he did not give to the public.

I do not know whether those statements were true or false, but I do know that it was an outrage to herd honorable men, incapable of such conduct, with the few who might have been guilty of it, and I assert that the publication of any such scandalous charges against a body of gentlemen without the designation of the names of the individuals who had been found so small and so corrupt and so unfit for the positions that they occupied as to embezzle the property intrusted to them for distribution was not only an insult to the Congress of the United States, but an unmanly attack inconsistent with the dignity of a Cabinet officer. [Applause.]

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, however small and obscure the individual who, by chance or under Executive favor, should happen to be raised to the high position of a Cabinet officer, the mere fact of his elevation ought to raise him above any such contemptible littleness. [Applause.] For one, as a member of the Fifty-third Congress, I resent and denounce as a slander the imputation that that body, or any considerable number of its members, were guilty of the crime of selling the seeds which were allotted to them for distribution among their constituents. [Applause.]

This, Mr. Chairman, may be very strong language as applied to a Cabinet officer. I do not know whether the Cabinet officer was responsible for these reports or not. I know that the reports were spread broadcast in the press. They were never contradicted by the Agricultural Department. They purported to emanate from the Agricultural Department, and I say, sir, the fact that this slander was sent out against Congress indicated a feeling on the part of the head of that Department toward it that was absolutely unaccountable.

So far as I am concerned, I care nothing whatever about the seeds. I believe that to abolish the system of the distribution of seeds through members of Congress would be advantageous to the members. It is a burden and expense; it is no advantage to any member of Congress. The member of Congress receives a few thousand packages of seeds. He has not one package for every ten constituents. For every constituent who receives a package of seeds and who is gratified at the compliment ten are dissatisfied because they have not been likewise favored, so that the pretense that this is an electioneering scheme of Congressmen is a false one. No Congressman benefits anything by it, unless under the old system he might use a considerable part of his salary in buying seed and having them sent out through the Agricultural Department, a system which I believe at one time prevailed.

Mr. RAY. With the gentleman's permission, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BOATNER. With pleasure.

Mr. RAY. Does not the gentleman know the fact that the hard heart of the Secretary of Agriculture has relented, and that out of the abundance of his generosity—and of the appropriation—he is about to make most generous distribution? I received a letter this week from the Secretary of Agriculture announcing that he had complied with the law; that he had made an apportionment, under the appropriation act, of seeds, plants, and bulbs, and that the pro rata coming to me for my district of 216,000 people would be 15 grape seeds and 25 strawberry plants. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, justice to the Secretary of Agriculture requires that that admission should be made. I received a similar letter, advising me that there were 40 grape cuttings and 100 strawberry plants at my disposal for distribution in my district. I suppose the Secretary had found some rare kind of grapes——

Mr. RAY. I think the difference in the number distributed shows the partiality of this Democratic Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the only thing Democratic that the Secretary ever did. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER. I infer from receiving this letter that he had found grape cuttings which were heretofore unknown, probably discovered in Armenia or some foreign parts, and probably some Chinese strawberries. I could not account for it in any other way. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, coming down to the question at issue, the main question, shall the House of Representatives continue to permit an executive officer to discredit its authority? There is no principle better established in law than that after a statute has received executive or judicial construction its reenactment in the same language is a legislative indorsement and confirmation of that construction. This appropriation was made by reason of a section of the Revised Statutes that has stood for many years, one that was executed by the Commissioner of Agriculture before that Department was erected to the dignity of a Department, executed by the predecessors of the present Secretary of Agriculture, and executed by him for three successive years. The appropriation to be expended under that statute was an indorsement, a confirmation by Congress, of the construction which has been put on it by the Secretaries of Agriculture.

Then, sir, the refusal by the present Secretary of Agriculture to execute the law, to expend the appropriation, was in deliberate contempt of the authority of the Congress of the United States. I so construe it, and for one, as a member of Congress, I am tired—I am disgusted with having this body brought into discredit and its authority despised by mere executive officers. Why, sir, it has got to the point that a mere subordinate, a man who is known as Comptroller of the Treasury [laughter], declares an act of Congress unconstitutional and refuses his "royal assent" to its execution. [Laughter and applause.] It has come to the point that a second veto power has been discovered. While Congress may pass a law which if the President should veto, might be passed, his objections to the contrary notwithstanding, a clerk in the Treasury Department may turn it down, so that the parties who are interested have to go to the courts and obtain a judicial indorsement of our action. A two-thirds majority can not reach him, because the Congress which enacted the law has passed out of existence, or may not be in session when the veto of the clerk is pronounced.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask how long it is since that happened?

Mr. BOATNER. This has occurred just recently.

Mr. SKINNER. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield two minutes of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. SKINNER. As I understand the gentleman's purpose is to secure action on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, I want to ask the gentleman if an amendment of this kind would not accomplish that purpose and be in order? And if so, I will give notice to amend on page 20, after the word "dollars," in line 25, by adding the following words:

And it is hereby made mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture to make such purchase and distribution of seed as was done prior to 1895.

Mr. BOATNER. I think that would cover the case if such an amendment should be adopted.

I want to say that I suspected the Secretary of Agriculture would refuse to execute this law on the ground of the unconstitutionality of an act appropriating public moneys for this purpose. I believed he would have done so under the narrow construction placed upon the Constitution by some but for the fact that if he had instituted one investigation for this purpose he would have found there was no authority in that instrument for his Department. In other words, that while the expenditure of Congressional appropriations for the purchase of seeds might be unconstitutional, the office which he held was still more unconstitutional, and that may be the reason why he did not make the point that the proposed expenditure of money was unconstitutional.

It has become fashionable in some quarters of late to discredit this body and its membership. Those who do so forget that the members of this House directly represent the people of the United States, and reflections upon them are reflections upon their constituents. No doubt the Secretary of Agriculture entertained a profound contempt for the Congress whose enactment he refused to execute, but it would be wise for him to remember that the people of the United States have not invested him with any authority to exercise his judgment about the wisdom of the laws which he is called upon to execute, and that until he is vested with legislative powers he can better utilize his time in the execution of his official duties than in criticising the acts of the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $2,500,000, in round numbers, for the support of this Department of the Government that is supposed to be in the interest of the agricultural people of this great country. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, it was intended——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me? Inadvertently he stated the amount inaccurately. The amount carried by the bill is $3,158,192.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I accept the correction, Mr. Chairman. I had the figures from a member of the committee. I regret that I am not posted as to this bill, not being a member of that committee.

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that three million and odd thousand in money is appropriated and has been appropriated for a specific purpose; and we all remember when the strife was on hand throughout this country to create the office of Secretary of Agriculture and make the Secretary a Cabinet officer, there was serious doubt as to the constitutional right and power to do so. But the farmers of this country, from one end to the other, petitioned Congress, and continued to do so until that Bureau was exalted, and instead of the chief of that Bureau being the Commissioner of Agriculture he was promoted to Secretary of Agriculture and a member of the Cabinet.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this country will hold and should hold the Committee on Agriculture of this House responsible for the administration of that office and that Department of the Government. Those of us who belong to other committees of the House can not understand this matter in detail, nor have we time under the regulation adopted by this House to understand and discuss these bills in detail.

Mr. KEM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Certainly.

Mr. KEM. I understand you to say that the country ought to hold the committee responsible. Does not the gentleman think that this Congress ought to hold the Secretary responsible?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I said this committee ought to be held responsible, and the House ought to hold the committee responsible, for the proper administration of this Department. I do not propose to stir up the members of that committee and to answer all their questions. I have not the time.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to ask my colleague, does he hold this committee responsible for the appointment of Secretary Morton?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would he put upon this committee the great burden of being either the conscience keeper or lip care of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; I would not.

A MEMBER. Do you hold this committee responsible?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do hold this committee responsible for bringing back a bill into this House with this provision:

Division of seeds:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution as required by law.

That is the very verbiage under which he took shelter before and dodged and refused to execute the will of this House and administer his Department as we directed him to do it. And yet you come back into this House with the same verbiage in your bill, as ambiguous as Mr. Morton or anybody else would like to have it. I have no excuse to offer for Mr. Morton, and I want it distinctly understood that I think he has gone a long way and certainly has stretched his conscience and stretched the Constitution and the law a great deal more when he has refused to expend that money as the House directed him to expend it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. If the committee had changed that provision of the bill, would not the point of order have been raised against it that it changed existing law?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir. I presume that every man on the floor of this House is ready to stand up here, when the occasion arises, as a friend of the farmer. [Laughter.] I have never yet seen it fail. The man does not come to Congress who dare make a point of order upon an amendment or a provision in a bill which directly affects the interests of the people who sustain this great Government of ours, who furnish three-fourths of our exports in time of peace, who furnish nine-tenths of our soldiers in time of war, and who, in their taxpaying capacity in its last analysis, which is the sweat of the face, pay nearly all the taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia, if he will permit me, that after March 4, 1897, we propose to have a Republican Secretary of Agriculture who will carry out the law as now written on the statute book.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. We have not time to wait for that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, let the gentleman take heed that his party does have such a Secretary. We shall hold them to that promise; and I want to make a suggestion in that connection to my friend from New York who was so kind as to make that suggestion to me. I say to him: Put a man there who knows how to clean the mud off his own boots, how to manage a farm, how to work a farm, and not a politician, not a man who goes over the country singing either goldbugism or silverism. [Applause.] Give us a man who is not only a scientific man, but a practical man; above all, a man who is in touch with the people who draw a line over a mule and plow from Monday morning until Saturday noon, and then ride 10 miles to get their mail, receiving, perhaps, a weekly paper and a letter once a month. When such a man receives a few papers of seeds through the mail he goes home rejoicing in the fact, saying to himself, "I am a citizen of a great country, and I am not forgotten, though ever so humble." [Applause.]

Let them give us a Secretary who is in touch with that kind of people, for they are the great bulk of our people. What difference does it make to a man who lives in New York or in Atlanta, who has his mail dumped into his lap, by his own fireside, three or five times a day, whether he gets any seeds or not, when his property is all in stocks and bonds? But the poor farmer who does not know anything about the market, who can not know anything about the market, who has neither time nor money to buy agricultural books or periodicals to post himself about rare and valuable seeds—it is for his benefit that the Secretary is placed in that Department to act as a trustee or medium through whom the seeds that we provide to be distributed shall go to a people who do not know and can not know about them, or procure them in any other way. I say to my Republican friends, therefore: If you do change the Secretary of Agriculture be sure and get a man who is in touch with the great mass of the people. Do that, whatever else you do.

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask this Committee on Agriculture why it is that they have recommended only the small sum of $130,-

000 for the purchase of seeds, bulbs, flowers, and rare plants, when, in the preceding section of the bill, they recommend $25,000 contingent fund for lamps, and twine, and brushes, and brooms, and maps, and oils, and paints, and such like? If Mr. Morton can afford to spend $25,000 for the articles enumerated in the preceding section without any compunctions of conscience, in the name of heaven why can not he spend $130,000 for the benefit of more than 9,000,000 of men, women, and children who never saw the city of Washington, who never will see it, who, many of them, do not get upon a railroad car once in their lifetime, who are isolated and separated from the great centers of this country, centers of intelligence as well as centers of commerce—why, I ask, could not the Secretary afford to spend $130,000 for those people? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I want to see every member of this committee take hold of this bill and change and amend it as it should be changed and amended, so that, in the first place, it shall answer the purpose for which the Department was created and not for the benefit of the politicians or a nest place for officeholders, but for all the people who farm the land and till the soil. In the second place, I want to see them take the bill and amend it so that the servant—and Morton is nothing but a servant, and I want him to understand that [laughter and applause]—to see that our servant, the Secretary of Agriculture, obeys the will of the House. [Applause.]

Now, this country has just about reached this point: There are three branches of the Government, and I am perfectly willing to let the legislative department attend to its own business, and, so far as I can, I am determined that the other departments of the Government shall attend to their own business and let ours alone. [Applause.] And we will draw the line and have it distinctly understood that this is our branch of Government and is not under the control of any Comptroller of the Treasury or the Secretary of Agriculture, and that he can not undertake to nullify laws made by the House of Representatives. [Applause.] If the appropriation for seeds and plants, as carried by the last bill, was unconstitutional we have a Department (judicial) authorized so to declare. For the first time in the history of this Department we have an officer charged with the duty of executing the laws, nullifying the law; not only so, but abolishing the seed division, thus defying Congress again to attempt its restoration except at great expense. The Department has done great good in times past, not by lecturing or writing in favor of gold monometallism, silver monometallism, or bimetallism, but by a careful study as to how best to develop and build up our agricultural and kindred interests. Let us have liberal appropriations to this end and a Secretary that does not know so much more than Congress, and then we can again move on to success.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEREDITH].

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on that side has been exhausted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are five minutes of the general debate left, and I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield back any time I did not use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia occupied his entire time. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] did not occupy all of his, and there are a few minutes yet remaining on that side.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield part of that time to the gentleman from Virginia and the rest to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I have no controversy with the Secretary of Agriculture; I have no criticism upon the Committee of Agriculture and no criticism of the bill which has been introduced here by the committee. But what I desire to emphasize is this: That when it was insinuated that members of the last Congress had sold their proportion of seeds that they had received for distribution among the people it was an insinuation against every member of the House unless the names of the parties who were guilty of that offense were made known.

I think it due to the House and every member of it, and especially due to the last House and to the ex-members who were here then as members, that the names of those who have done this act shall be made known; and I will support a resolution, if any gentleman will introduce it, or will be glad at the proper time myself to introduce a resolution, calling on the Secretary of Agriculture to give the names of parties who have sold their proportion of seeds that were intended for distribution among the people.

My reason is this: Like all members of this House, I am getting dozens and dozens of letters from constituents asking me to send them seed. I presume that is the case with every member present. It may be said that nobody would suppose that a member here would sell his seeds; but we all know very well that designing people can go through the country and tell people that the reason they do not get seed in response to their application is because that "darned scoundrel" down there in Washington has been selling them. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SORG, for three days, on account of important business.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. DANIELS, for ten days, for rest and on account of exacting business.

To Mr. SMITH of Illinois, for two weeks.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 4462) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation will be laid upon the table, in the absence of objection, the Senate bill having passed the House to-day.

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. WADSWORTH (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Chippewa River, Wisconsin—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.
